These are the only matters of importance. The first question, if the Chair will allow me, was an amendment offered by the committee striking out Rule XIII, touching the sale of intoxicating liquors. A majority of the committee believed that that was a matter which should be left to each House.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether the members of the committee appointed on the part of the Senate constitute the Library Committee of the Senate also. Our Library Committee constitutes a portion of the joint committee.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed joint rules will now be reported subject to amendment. Does the Senator from Maine desire to have action first upon the amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. FRYE. On the amendment, if the Chair please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment of the Committee on Rules is to strike out Rule XIII, as follows:

XIII.—SALE OF LIQUORS FORBIDDEN.

No spirituous or malt liquors shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto; and it shall be the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the presiding officers thereof respectively, to strictly enforce the foregoing provisions, and any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate or connive at the violation of this rule shall be dismissed from office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the proposed amendment striking out this clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the only amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I did not understand the proposition. Was the vote on adopting the clause just read, inserting it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote was on adopting the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have the effect of it stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question just taken was on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. Which was what?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To strike out the thirteenth clause, which will be again read.

Mr. CONGER. That proposition was not stated by the Chair. I voted under a misapprehension.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was read by the Chief Clerk, and the Chair stated the proposition as read to strike out a certain portion, being the words contained in clause 13. That amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have another vote on it. I ask for a division on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Senator from Michigan states that he did not understand the question, the Chair will again submit it.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Michigan can ask for a separate vote on that when the resolution is reported to the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I can ask for a division, too, I suppose, which I do if there is no other way of getting at it. Now, will the Chair state the proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Rules have proposed to strike out clause 13 of the proposed joint rules.

Mr. CONGER. The whole clause?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

XIII.—SALE OF LIQUORS FORBIDDEN.

No spirituous or malt liquors shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto; and it shall be the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the presiding officers thereof, respectively, to strictly enforce the foregoing provisions, and any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate or connive at the violation of this rule shall be dismissed from office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out this clause.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I would like to ask the Senator from Maine what was the object of striking out this rule.

Mr. FRYE. The majority of the committee believed that that was a matter to be regulated by each House for itself. The Senate regulates this side of the building, and the majority of the committee believed that the matter should be left to the House of Representatives on the other side. And I learn from the committee of the House that they entertained that belief very decidedly.

Mr. CONGER. This clause provides for the control of the Capitol and its officers and employés and the grounds of the Capitol Square. Neither House has control over the Capitol Square per se. Neither House has control of the Rotunda. Neither House has control of the rooms around it. It can only be by joint rule that such control in regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol and the grounds of the Capitol of the nation can be exercised. I should be very sorry, when such a rule has been proposed, to see a vote of the Senate striking it out and having no control over the general public grounds around the Capitol or any part of the Capitol itself. I think the public demand will be that such a rule as this should be adopted and should be enforced, and I should like to have the views of the Senate upon that; so I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine by what authority the Senate gets the control of its own wing of the Capitol. Is it by authority of law, or is it by the authority of the joint rules, by which each House of Congress takes control of that part of the building?

Mr. FRYE. I know of no authority except the rule of the Senate which gave the Committee on Rules this general authority over the Senate wing.

Mr. HOAR. My question is where the Senate gets its authority?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know.

Mr. HOAR. Because if the Senate gets its authority only by virtue of a joint rule, it is quite proper that a joint rule should be mandatory upon both Houses, so that neither House can repeal or interfere with it without the consent of the other.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 1820 of the Revised Statutes says:

The Sergeants-at-Arms of the Senate and of the House of Representatives are authorized to make such regulations as they may deem necessary for preserving the peace and securing the Capitol from defacement, and for the protection of the public property therein, and they shall have power to arrest and detain any person violating such regulations, until such person can be brought before the proper authorities for trial.

That seems to be the only statutory declaration as to the control of the Capitol building and the public property therein. My understanding is that the Capitol grounds, under which designation would be included the reservation immediately adjoining the Capitol, are under the control of the general laws and regulations of the District of Columbia, that is, so far as the preservation of the public peace and order extends. What I have read, I think, is the only statutory provision that bears on this question.

Mr. MORGAN. I would suggest also to the chairman of the Committee on Rules that there is another part of the building over which I suppose we would not exercise any supervision, and ought not, and perhaps can not, unless in pursuance of a law, and that is the part of it which is occupied by the Supreme Court, its clerk, its marshal, and its librarian. This thirteenth clause is broad enough to cover all the Capitol building and all of the adjacent grounds. We may find ourselves legislating about the control of that portion of the Capitol which has been assigned to the Supreme Court and its officers, and may exclude the Supreme judges, if they saw proper, from having any such refreshment as a glass of wine or something like that which they might find necessary in their arduous labors. I think we had better not undertake to legislate on this subject by a joint rule. We had better pass a statute if we expect to deprive the Supreme Court of any of its supposed privileges in this regard.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this building was constructed by funds appropriated from the public Treasury, and it belongs to the people of the United States. Although this room and the adjacent offices and committee-rooms are occupied by the Senate and its officers and its committees, it can not in any sense whatever be regarded as the property of the Senate or under the control of the Senate other than as they are authorized to control it by some statute of the United States regularly passed and approved by the President; and I should very much question whether the power of the Senate or the power of the Senate and House of Representatives jointly could be properly exerted to the extent that is proposed in the thirteenth joint rule which the committee propose to strike out.

This is a public building belonging to the people of the United States, constructed with their money, and the portion that we now occupy is designated for our use for a specific purpose, and could be employed by statute or devoted by statute to any other purpose; and my judgment as one member of the committee was that it was beyond the purview of the authority which we are empowered to exercise over this structure and its surroundings.

If it is thought advisable to legislate upon the subject of prohibition that is a matter in which the House of Representatives and the Senate and the President of the United States will all be called upon to do their share; and while I might entertain my private views as to the propriety or the impropriety of the use of alcoholic liquors in the restaurants of this building or in the committee-rooms of this building, still I am inclined to think that the exclusion of intoxicating liquors or of improper personages is a matter for legislation, and not for action by the Senate sitting in its individual capacity. It was in consequence of these views that as one member of the Committee on Rules, without expressing any opinion as to the morality or policy of prohibition, I thought it wise to relegate, so far as the police of these two sections of the Capitol is concerned, the subject to the legislation, if it can so be called, of each House for itself so long as the two Houses occupy the Capitol Extension.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that the remarks of the two members of the Committee on Rules who have spoken have disclosed a very grave and serious defect in the law, which that committee or some other ought instantly to address itself to remedying. Certainly each House of Congress ought to have absolute power by rule to control the use and occupation of the wing of the Capitol which it occupies, and the two Houses ought to have the power by joint rule to control the approaches to the Capitol, the entire public grounds in which the Capitol is situated; and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Rules will see that a bill is introduced to confer that power upon the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, in respect to the power of the presiding officers to control certain things in the Capitol Grounds, there is a law which forbids any procession or military array, and all that sort of thing which I need not go into in detail, from parading or coming within the Capitol Grounds except on the joint authority of the presiding officers of the two Houses, and I do not know but that it must be also recommended by somebody else; but no matter for that; there is a provision of law which appears to be adequate for that purpose as regards the public use of these grounds. I do not know where it is in the statutes, but while I was Presiding Officer of the Senate I had occasion in one or two instances to have it examined and looked up, and I found that to be the law in regard to particular things.

Mr. HOAR. That is very inadequate to the general purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes; I am only speaking of it as a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. I think the Senator from Kansas expressed the opinion of the majority of the committee that the Senate had power to regulate the conduct of these matters within that portion of the building which is delegated or assigned to the Senate for its use, that its power did not extend any further, that the House of Representatives had the same power in regard to that portion of the Capitol assigned to it, and its power extended no further, and that there must be a resort to law to extend the provisions to the rest of the building and to the grounds. The Senate commits to the Committee on Rules regulations touching the use of all these rooms and the conduct of certain matters in the rooms, and the Senate Committee on Rules has established rules for the regulation of the Senate wing, contained in the manual, to which the attention of Senators is not very frequently called, and among these rules is Rule X, "Senate restaurant," which goes on to make provision touching the Senate restaurant, what shall be and what shall not be done. The other House remits to the Speaker, if I remember correctly, the same supervision of its restaurant that the Committee on Rules has here, and nothing has been done in a number of years touching that matter in the House restaurant.

Now, the committee, believing that under the law they had no authority to pass a rule like clause 13, preferred to leave that matter to be offered in the House for the consideration of the House, and retain its own rule adopted by the Committee on Rules for the conduct of this sort of business on the Senate side.

Mr. CONGER. Read that rule.

Mr. FRYE. The rule is quite long.

Mr. CONGER. Read the part relative to this subject.

Mr. FRYE. It provides that—

> The restaurant shall be kept open during the session of the Senate and during such other parts of the year as the Committee on Rules may direct.
> The caterer shall give his personal attention and care to the management of the restaurant. The equipment for the tables and for the service shall be first class. No spirituous liquors shall be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant. All parts of the restaurant, with its kitchen and office, shall be kept scrupulously clean.

And so on. What the Committee on Rules here is authorized to do by the rules of the Senate, the Speaker of the House is authorized to do in the other wing by the rules of the House, and as I say the committee on examining that clause arrived at the conclusion by a majority that that clause would require a law rather than a rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Before action is had on the motion I ask to amend in line 4 of this section before the words "Sergeants-at-Arms" by inserting the word "respective," so that it shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms of each House to enforce this rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I move to amend by striking out the words "for sale."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] to strike out the words "for sale," so as to read:

> No intoxicating liquors shall be offered, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, &c.

The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules to strike out the thirteenth clause.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I certainly thought I asked for the yeas and nays on striking out the words "for sale."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was but one vote cast on either side that the Chair could hear.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not think the Chair presented the question properly to the Senate. I ask pardon for speaking in that way. The question should have been, "Are there a sufficient number up to order the yeas and nays?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again submit the question on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, upon which he now asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays upon the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, not a sufficient number of Senators rising.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Have I not a right now to ask for the yeas and nays on that proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending proposition.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I refer to the question of striking out the words "for sale."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been refused on that motion. If the Senator desires again to ask for them——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Chair did not put the question, to my knowledge, as to whether the yeas and nays should be ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Virginia desires, the question will be again put to the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the proposition to strike out the words "for sale." If I can not get them, it will determine the question as to whether the Senate is opposed to really having a temperance organization here, or whether it is not; that is all. It is not a mere question of saying that you shall not have some beer or something else in the restaurant, but it involves more than that. The main point is as to the committee-rooms. If we are going to have anything like prohibition, why are we not able to meet the question here now and say that there shall be no liquor exhibited in this wing of the Capitol, no liquor offered here, and leave out the words "for sale?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks that the question on the amendment proposed by him shall be taken by yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand till they can be counted. [Senators rose.] The Chair finds but three rising, and the call for the yeas and nays is denied. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Rules to strike out clause 13.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. SAWYER. I was paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay." I now understand that my pair has been changed to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], and I vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I have voted on this question, believing he would vote similarly.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Beck,	Eustis,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Brown,	Gray,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Call,	Hampton,	Manderson,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Morgan,	Walthall.

NAYS—36.

Butler,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Camden,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson of Md.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of N. Y.,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRYE. Now I ask that the reading proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint rules as proposed will now be read at length.

Mr. FRYE. By clauses for amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read by clauses for amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the following be the joint rules of the two Houses:

JOINT RULES OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

I.—ORGANIZATION.

At the commencement of each Congress, and of each session thereafter, it shall, on motion, be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives to communicate promptly to the other House notice of the appearance of a quorum and of the organization of their respective Houses for the transaction of business, which notice shall be in writing and be duly attested by each of said officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection or amendment this rule will be considered as agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read Rule II, as follows:

II.—MESSAGES.

1. All messages between the two Houses shall be communicated by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, or by clerks designated by them for that purpose, which messages shall be announced at the door of each House by the Doorkeeper or his assistant, and shall be communicated to the Chair by the person by whom they may be sent.

2. All messages from the President of the United States or the other House, all reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and all communications addressed to the Senate or House of Representatives, shall be placed in order on the table of the presiding officer of each House.

3. It shall be the duty of the presiding officer of each House, immediately after the reading and approval of the journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting, the time allotted for morning business remaining unexpired, to lay before the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, all messages on their respective tables, for reference to appropriate committees, or for such other action as may be deemed proper.

4. All bills, joint and concurrent resolutions, referred to committees under the foregoing clause, shall be printed, unless otherwise ordered at the time of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule III, as follows:

III.—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

All bills, joint resolutions, or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill or joint resolution has commenced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. CALL. I do not know that an objection will have force here, but it seems to me that this rule and the following one are not within the constitutional power of a concurrent resolution. The Constitution says "each House may determine the rules of its proceeding." This is certainly a separate power in each House, a continuing power. It does not refer to any particular period of time, but relates to the Senate or the House at all times. It is a separate power. Now the proposed joint rule says that each House shall not determine the rules of its proceeding in the respect mentioned, but that it shall be done by a joint rule of the two Houses. These things are certainly incompatible. A thing can not be constitutionally done by the joint action of both Houses and yet each House at all times at any minute when the question may come up have the power to disregard it and proceed according to its own ideas. Therefore, sir, it seems to me very clear that we can not by a joint rule of the two Houses deprive each House of the constitutional power of proceeding at any time in regard to matters before it as it may see fit to determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the third rule proposed by the Committee on Rules.

The rule was adopted.

The Chief Clerk read Rule IV, as follows:

IV.—GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS.

1. No amendment shall be in order to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be to carry out the provisions of existing law, or treaty stipulation, or in pursuance of a resolution of the House having the bill under consideration, unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee.

2. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto, and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of this rule.

The rule was adopted.

The Chief Clerk read Rule V, as follows:

V.—ENGROSSED BILLS.

Bills, joint and concurrent resolutions, which have passed either House, and amendments thereto which shall have passed the other House, shall be engrossed on paper and attested by the signature of the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively, as the case may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection this rule will be considered as agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read Rule VI, as follows:

VI.—ENROLLED BILLS.

1. After a bill or joint resolution shall have passed both Houses, it shall be duly enrolled on parchment by the Secretary or Clerk of the House in which said bill or joint resolution originated; shall be examined by a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of said House, who shall carefully examine and compare the enrolled with the engrossed bill as passed by both Houses, and, correcting all errors, if any be found, report the said bill or joint resolution forthwith for signature, as hereinafter provided.

2. After examination of any bill or joint resolution by a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of either House, it shall be reported, first to the House of Representatives, where it shall be signed by the Speaker or Speaker pro tempore, and be communicated forthwith to the Senate for the signature of its President or President pro tempore, as the case may be, in either House.

3. After a bill or joint resolution shall have been thus signed in each House, it shall be presented to the President of the United States by a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the House in which it originated, which fact shall be indorsed on the back of said bill or joint resolution, and be dully attested by the Secretary or Clerk, as the case may be, of the House in which it did originate.

4. The member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills presenting to the President an enrolled bill or joint resolution shall certify to the Secretary or Clerk of the House in which the same originated the date of such presentation, which shall be entered on the Journal of said House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule VII, as follows:

VII.—RESOLUTIONS.

All resolutions which are to be presented to the President of the United States or head of a Department shall be duly engrossed, attested by the Secretary or Clerk of the House adopting the same, and by him be presented to the President or head of a Department as the case may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule VIII, as follows:

VIII.—BILLS, JOINT AND CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS.

1. Each House shall transmit to the other all papers on which any bill, joint or concurrent resolution shall be founded, and when a bill, joint or concurrent resolution which has passed one House shall be rejected in the other, it shall not be introduced or submitted again during the same session without a notice of ten days and leave of two-thirds of the House in which it shall be renewed.

2. When a bill, joint or concurrent resolution, which shall have passed one House, is rejected by the other, notice thereof shall be given to the House passing the same.

3. After each House shall have adhered to their disagreement, a bill, joint or concurrent resolution shall be lost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule IX, as follows:

IX.—CONFERENCES.

1. When a bill, joint or concurrent resolution has passed one House and been amended in the other, it shall be in order for the amending House to at once insist on its amendment or amendments, and ask a conference thereon with the other House, or in case it does not so insist, and the originating House disagrees to said amendment or amendments, it shall be in order at the time of such disagreement to move a conference thereon with the other House. If a conference be ordered, the presiding officer shall appoint three members as managers at the said conference on the part of the dissenting House, which action shall be promptly communicated to the other House. If that House insist on its amendment or amendments, and agree to the proposed conference, the presiding officer thereof shall thereupon appoint three Senators or Representatives, as the case may be, to represent said House at said conference, which action shall be promptly communicated to the other House.

2. All committees of conference shall meet at the call of their chairman, and shall state verbally or in writing, as they may choose, the reasons for the actions of their respective Houses touching the amendment or amendments in dispute between the two Houses. It shall not be in order for a conference committee to consider or include in their report matter or subjects not in dispute between their respective Houses, nor shall the committee change the text of a bill, joint or concurrent resolution to which both Houses have agreed, unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to perfect the bill after amendment.

3. The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read, while the roll is being called, while either House is dividing, or pending a motion to adjourn, and a detailed statement sufficiently explicit to inform the two Houses what effect the report will have upon the subjects or propositions to which they relate shall accompany every conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule X, as follows:

X.—CALENDARS.

During the last ten days of a session, when either House has proceeded to the consideration of business on a calendar, bills, joint and concurrent resolutions of the other House shall be given precedence, and shall be taken up and disposed of in regular order unless otherwise ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule XI, as follows:

XI.—JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

There shall be a Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, to consist of three members on the part of each House, to which shall be referred all proposed legislation or matters touching said Library, and all matters relating to statuary or pictures or works of art which may come before either House. It shall also superintend and direct the expenditure of all moneys appropriated therefor, and shall perform such other duties as are or may be directed by law or order of the two Houses, and during the period between the expiration of a Congress and the commencement of the next, all duties devolving by law or otherwise on the Joint Committee on the Library shall be performed by the members of said committee on the part of the Senate of the preceding Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule XII, as follows:

XII.—JOINT ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

When the two Houses shall judge it proper to make a joint address to the President it shall be presented to him at such place and time as he may designate by the President or President pro tempore of the Senate in the presence of the Speaker or Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives, and both Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This rule will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read Rule XIII, as follows:

XIII.—SALE OF LIQUORS FORBIDDEN.

No intoxicating liquors shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto: and it shall be the duty of the respective Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the presiding officers thereof, respectively, to strictly enforce the foregoing provisions, and any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate or connive at the violation of this rule shall be dismissed from office.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment to come in after the word "therewith" in the second line——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama withdraw that a moment? I rose to speak on the twelfth rule. I did not catch the question being put.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. HOAR. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is worth while to preserve in our legislative processes the power of the President to designate a place other than the Capitol at which the two bodies may be required to be present in session. It seems to me a joint address may be presented by the officers of the two Houses without the attendance of the bodies.

Mr. FRYE. The old rule contained the words "audience chamber," and those were stricken out and these words put in.

Mr. HOAR. Now, if the Senate will allow this to be considered as before them——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move to reconsider the vote by which the twelfth rule was adopted?

Mr. HOAR. Let it be treated as reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the vote on the adoption of the twelfth rule be informally reconsidered. If there be no objection, that will be considered agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to strike out the words "and both Houses." If the Houses choose to attend on any particular state occasion, to accompany the presentation of an address, they can provide for it at the time, but to deny the Houses the power of communicating in the old fashion their views to the President, without requiring them always to attend in person and in organizations, seems to me a very cumbrous and useless mechanism. I move to strike out the words "and both Houses."

Mr. FRYE. I do not regard that as of any particular importance. The old joint Rule XX was exactly that, with the exception that the words "audience chamber" were in the old rule instead of the words inserted here, "at such place and time as he may designate." That is the only change from the old rule.

Mr. HOAR. I propose to make another one by striking out the words which I think unimportant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is to strike out the words "and both Houses" at the end of the proposed joint rule. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule XII as amended will be considered as agreed to. Rule XIII is now before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend, after the word "therewith," in the second line of the print, by inserting "which by law is under the exclusive control of either House or the joint control of both Houses;" so as to read:

No intoxicating liquors shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol or in any room or building connected therewith which by law is under the exclusive control of either House or the joint control of both Houses.

My object being to avoid interfering with that part of the Capitol which is not under the control of either House by law. In some way the Supreme Court has a lodgment in this Capitol building, and its members certainly have a right to prescribe rules within their own domain for the proper preservation of order, and we have no right as two Houses, by concurrent resolution, in the absence of a law, to provide for them what those rules shall be; but the rule as reported, and which the Senate has refused to strike out, includes the Supreme Court and assumes to exercise a jurisdiction over that body as a means of preserving order, which I think we have no right to do. I offer the amendment for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see any objection to it. I make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I see objection to it, sir, and my objection amounts to this, that we are undertaking here to establish a kind of local option or prohibition business in the Senate wing of the Capitol. That is exactly what this means. I have no objection to prohibition in Maine, or local option in Kansas or wherever else it may suit the people to have it; but I do object to voting for a proposition here which has an appearance of doing something which every Senator on this floor knows, if he has read the paragraph, is a matter of false pretense. That is just what this paragraph amounts to.

"No intoxicating liquors shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto."

And the men who are to enforce this paragraph are men who have not access to your committee-rooms unless you choose to let them come in. The Sergeant-at-Arms can not come into my committee-room, if you will allow me to use that personal pronoun, without my consenting to his coming in. He can not come in there unless he comes by order of the Senate to take my body into his possession and bring me here under a call. There is not a civil officer under the Government of the United States or any State government who can take me or anybody else from a committee-room under civil process, and this is not made a misdemeanor even.

Now, sir, if we are to have something that amounts to prohibition in the Senate, let us have it. Let us say that no man shall keep liquor in his committee-room, or if he does so it shall be a misdemeanor, and he shall be liable to fine and imprisonment when he gets out of the Senate Chamber and when he can be made answerable to criminal process. Otherwise this amounts to nothing. I object to it for that reason. I object to it because I assert again that it is a pretense of doing something that the Senate of the United States does not mean.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, it may seem strange to some old Senators here, but this is exactly word for word the rule of these two bodies from 1866 down to the time that the joint rules went out of existence, with the exception of one single word, and that is the word "strictly." This says the officers shall "strictly enforce." So from 1867 down to the time the joint rules ceased to be joint rules, that was the joint rule of these two bodies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the thirteenth rule as amended.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to offer the following amendment: At the end of line 1, strike out the words "exhibited or kept;" so as to read:

No spirituous or malt liquors shall be offered for sale within the Capitol, &c

I believe the rule in all the prohibition States, so far as I know anything of it, is that the law only prevents the sale or the manufacture and sale, and it does not pretend to regulate the conduct of persons as to whether they will keep the article or drink it. I have never kept spirituous liquors of any kind in the Capitol, and I never drink spirituous liquors in the Capitol; but still if any Senator chooses to carry such things to his committee-room or to any other place in the Capitol, and there with his friends take a social glass, I do not think we should prohibit it by the rules of the two Houses. I see no reason why we should make the rule here more stringent than it is made in the prohibition States, and therefore no reason why we should do more than prevent the sale of liquor in the Capitol or the Capitol grounds. I move, therefore, to strike out the words I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed by the Senator from Georgia to strike out after "sale" the words "exhibited or kept;" so as to read:

No spirituous or malt liquors shall be offered for sale within the Capitol, &c.

Mr. BROWN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. I wish to say a word on the amendment. I have no committee-room and have no personal interest in this matter, but there is one thing in this rule which I have always opposed, and that is the system of espionage, of informers, which seems to be embraced within the provisions of this thirteenth rule. Every Senator here knows very well that his clerk or his doorkeeper who sees him—assuming the case to exist—with a jug or a bottle or a flask in his committee-room, under the provisions of this rule must inform upon him, or he will be put out of office. We know that will not be done, and we know no Senator would tolerate it. If this rule is enacted there ought to be an amendment to it that any member of either House or any employé who connived at keeping liquor in the Capitol should be expelled. Let us apply it to Senators and Representatives, and do not let us, if we propose to go into wholesale prohibition, put it on the humble employés of the Senate and escape ourselves. We know very well that any Senator who wants alcoholic stimulants in his committee-room will have them, and we know that he would inflict the severest punishment within his power on any appointee of his who would inform on him. All I ask is that equal justice shall be meted out to all. I am opposed myself to the spirit of the whole thing. I believe that it will do no good; that it encourages hypocrisy, and that it is simply an attempt of which no Senator would be guilty. It is tampering to a fanatical spirit in the country on this question, to which I for one will never give my counsel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken,

Mr. KENNA. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Beck,	Coke,	Kenna,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Eustis,	Morgan,	Walthall,
Brown,	Gibson,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
Butler,	Gray,	Riddleberger,
Call,	Hampton,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Vest,

NAYS—35.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cameron,	Frye,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Chace,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Stanford,
Conger,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Teller,
Cullom,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pike,	Van Wyck,
Dawes,	Logan,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—19.

Blackburn,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Blair,	Gorman,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,
Bowen,	Hale,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Camden,	Harris,	Miller of Cal.,	Sabin.
Fair,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move an amendment to come in at the end of the proposed joint rule. The last clause reads:

And any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate or connive at the violation of this rule shall be dismissed from office.

I move to add:

And any Senator or Representative who violates the rule shall be liable to expulsion from the House of which he is a member.

Mr. President, I simply desire to say that it looks to me very small for grave Senators here to be adopting a rule for the purpose of inflicting severe punishment upon subordinate officers of this body when it is notorious that distinguished Senators who vote for that rule keep intoxicating liquors in their rooms. Why shall we undertake to visit punishment upon the subordinates, the poor officers of this body, for what distinguished Senators do, and they know it, and the public knows it? I am not speaking this out of any disrespect. I am not so hide-bound, although I have never had any liquor in this building. I have never drank it in any of the rooms of the distinguished Senators who have it so constantly and who will vote against this amendment.

I appeal to the Senate. Does it not look small, very small, will it not look so before an intelligent community, that Senators will undertake to inflict heavy punishment upon subordinate officers of the body for doing what they themselves set the example to do? Is this right? Is it fair? Is it just?

I want Senators treated by themselves as they would treat others. "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you," is a command higher and more binding than any mere rule of the Senate, and I now ask that Senators will be obedient to that command.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is best, I think, inasmuch as this great demonstration has been made here in behalf of the cause of prohibition, that the country should understand that we are straining at gnats and swallowing camels. I hold in my hand the bill of fare of the Senate café, the proprietor of which is alleged to be Mr. T. L. Page, whom I recollect a short time since to have seen advertised in the papers as being the only man in this country who could be selected to conduct the Senate restaurant on a strictly temperance basis. I presume that the majority of those Senators who have voted to-day to exclude from every portion of the Capitol everything of an intoxicating character take their lunch in the restaurant in the basement of the Capitol and order it from this bill of fare, which I send now to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read as my contribution to the debate, in order that the sincerity of those who are voting for this rigid, cast-iron rule to exclude everything that can intoxicate from the Capitol may be judged of by the country. Let the fourth page be read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. VEST. Is the Senator able to inform the Senate from what State this gentleman comes?

Mr. INGALLS. From the State, I am told, of Maine.

Mr. VEST. Ah!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper sent up to the Chair will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that it may be read by the Chief Clerk. It will, of course, sound mysterious, and will to a very large number of Senators, I presume, be in an unknown language; but let it be read with the figures appended to the names that appear thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TELLER. I had observed that bill of fare myself. I have not ordered anything from it, and I desire to vote for the proposed rule so that the restaurant-keeper may amend his bill of fare.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I voted against the proposition to strike out the proposed rule, not because I expected by that vote to stop any gentleman who wanted to take a drink of whisky from doing so, and not with a desire to stop any man who saw proper to do it, but I think the bill of fare which has been read exhibits to the country the necessity for the adoption of the rule. When in the Capitol of this nation a bill of fare is exhibited inviting to dissipation, and when we have the control of that restaurant, the control of this building, I believe we meet the just expectation of the country when we exhibit a determination that that thing, that disgrace, I may say, to the nation shall be no longer perpetrated.

While I do not myself indulge in intoxicating liquors I have no objection to gentlemen, who see proper, doing so, nor would I legislate to stop them from exercising the freest liberty, but as a Senator called upon to say whether liquor shall be sold or exhibited around the Senate Chamber, I believe that the judgment of the country is that it ought to be stopped, and hence I voted for the proposed joint rule. I think it is a disgrace to the American people that the Capitol of the country, erected for the enactment of laws for the government of the people, should be converted into a grog-shop or a place where liquor can be exhibited and sold, and where the youth of the land who come here, and who see proper to go to the restaurant, may purchase liquor. I think that we should not suffer this Capitol to become a grog-shop for the dissemination of intemperance throughout the land. I stand upon the resolution firmly fixed in my own mind that such a joint rule ought to be passed, and that liquor should not be sold within the bounds of the Capitol.

As to the objection which was made that we do not have control of this entire property, we do exercise a certain control; we appoint the police of the Capitol who take cognizance of this whole building, and we are not exceeding our authority when we say that there shall be no liquor sold within the Capitol or in the grounds surrounding it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the proposed joint rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope my good friend from Delaware will pay careful attention to the amendment which has been offered, and I hope he will vote for it. I have as little patience with drinking as the distinguished Senator from Delaware has, and I dislike to see it in this Capitol as much as he does; but I have never seen one-half as much of it among the employés of the Senate as I have among the Senators. The point I make is that it is a very small thing for Senators to be attempting to inflict condign punishment of dismissal upon the mere servants and employés of this body because they may have liquor in this establishment, when they, the Senators themselves, keep it in their rooms, invite their friends to go there, and often, at a time inopportune, are very merry.

I had never seen the bill of fare of which the distinguished Senator from Kansas spoke and which he had read. As I have understood, the Senate wing of the Capitol is under the control of the Senate and has been for years, and I prefer that the Senate wing shall remain under the control of the Senate, and that the Senate shall be responsible for its management. If every Senator is opposed to it, we can very quickly stop the sale of intoxicating liquors in that place. There is no doubt about that; there is no question of it. We have the power to-day without a joint rule. I believe that the Senate is capable of local self-government and that no joint rule is necessary. If we are not able to control our wing of the Capitol, and if we have to call upon a House of Representatives to enable us to keep liquor out of our end of the Capitol, we are not fit for local government, we are not capable of it.

I propose that the same penalties shall be visited upon Senators that we propose to visit upon our subordinate officers for a violation of this rule. It is right, it is just. I have known appropriation committees a few times delayed by reason of intoxication among the subordinates. I have seen the Senate adjourn largely because of the excitement of some of its members and of the plain indications that unnecessary discussions were about to grow up. I do not say that the Senate had to adjourn in consequence of this fact, but certain Senators were so disposed to discussion that the public business would not have been carried on, discussion would have been prolonged indefinitely, and other Senators here know that that point is well taken.

I do not want to see Senators so careful about subordinates and so negligent themselves, and I hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly will vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and I do it on the score of consistency.

I agree with him that if a violation of this rule is to bring upon the head of an employé of the Senate expulsion or dismissal from his place, there should be a similar penalty for a member of the Senate who will so far forget his duty as to violate the rule.

I say I vote for it on the ground of consistency. I turn to Rule XXXVI of the standing rules governing this body and I read in paragraph 4 as follows:

> Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and to punishment for contempt.

It seems to me that the proposition of the Senator from Missouri is in accord with the spirit of the rule which has obtained in the Senate of the United States from time immemorial, and therefore I shall vote for it.

But, Mr. President, it struck me as rather a remarkable thing that the class of liquors mentioned in the bill of fare read at the Secretary's desk should be offered for sale at the restaurant in the basement of the Senate wing, in view of the rule which was adopted, as I recall it, in the early part of the Forty-eighth Congress prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors. I am not an expert as to what should come under the name of "spirituous liquors," but it seems to me that some of the liquors read by the Secretary would certainly come under that rule.

I voted in favor of the report of the Committee on Rules. I did it because it seemed to me that much of the action of this body with reference to the sale of liquors had been extremely farcical, and it struck me that this proposed joint rule, worded as it is, like the rule of the Senate which was adopted in the Forty-eighth Congress, really meant nothing, and was a rule made simply to be broken.

I voted for the report of the committee also because of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Rules that it was the opinion of the majority of that committee that this proposed joint rule should not be adopted by the Senate, but that each of the two Houses of Congress should for itself control this matter, and if not to be thus controlled by a separate rule it should be made a matter of law, and a statute be passed by the action of both branches of Congress and the approving power of the President of the United States. Yet we have the remarkable condition of things that when a yea-and-nay vote is called upon this proposition not one member of the Committee on Rules comes to the support of the report of that committee. I certainly would like to hear from some of the gentlemen who are presumed to be learned in the laws governing these bodies, and let them come to the defense of the report.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Do I understand the Senator to say that no member of the Committee on Rules voted according to the report of that committee?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, sir; that was not my statement.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. That was not my statement, but I say that no member of the Committee on Rules by argument upon this floor has sustained or attempted to sustain the report of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I did.

Mr. MANDERSON. I did not hear the Senator, if that is so.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the Senator's misfortune.

Mr. MANDERSON. Perhaps it is. It is always a misfortune not to hear the Senator from Kansas. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that if this is a matter so important for enforcement in the Senate wing of the Capitol it might perhaps be well also for the Committee on the District of Columbia to attempt to supplement the action of the Committee on Rules by proper legislation concerning the sale of liquors in the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. We have often done that.

Mr. MANDERSON. Not in the way of this proposed rule, as I understand.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. As I understand the civil code which has just been presented by the Senator from Kansas for the government of the District of Columbia, we are to be licensed to drink liquor everywhere in the District of Columbia except in the Capitol, and we are to be licensed to drink it here if we are just smart enough not to be caught at it.

Now, sir, that is all the difference I can see between no rule and some rule. I can go to the Hamilton House, to the Arlington, to the Metropolitan, to the National—and I beg pardon if I fail to advertise all of them—and I can find just this same bill of fare. I speak for myself—I do not undertake to speak for any other Senator; but I say if you tear off the fourth page of that bill of fare you will soon find the gentleman from Maine vacating his place downstairs, because he will not have patronage enough to support him. That is an honest expression, but it is true in my opinion. We are to be licensed to drink wherever we please in the District of Columbia, but we are not licensed to drink in the Capitol unless we shall sneak liquor into a committee-room. That is just what this whole proposition amounts to.

I want to treat the whisky question as it deserves to be treated, for it is made a great question in the States. If we are going to treat it at all, let us say that we will not license the whisky traffic in the District of Columbia, where we have the entire right to make a law which shall prohibit it. I am ready for one, I am ready now, to vote for absolute prohibition in the District of Columbia; but if it is to be licensed for other people, then I do not want my liberty limited by a withdrawal of my right to take a drink whenever I may please where other people have a right to take it.

Meet the question here and now. If Senators can not control themselves, then let us have it understood that no liquor shall be allowed to come into this Capitol and none into the District of Columbia. The distinction that I draw between myself and the Senator from Kansas, myself and one of the Senators from Maine, is that they will only prohibit in this Capitol and will not prohibit in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE. I am on the whole rather sorry that this discussion has arisen on this clause, because some things have been said here that Senators will regret to have said. I remember breakfasting with some distinguished Senators, five or six years ago, who were members of the United States Senate twenty or twenty-five years back. The father of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania at my right [Mr. CAMERON] was one of them; Senator Hamlin of Maine was another. They began to relate reminiscences of the United States Senate, and they said that they had seen the Senate again and again without a quorum because more than a quorum was drunk. They had seen distinguished Senator after Senator undertake to rise in his seat to make a speech, and he could not rise because he was drunk.

I have been in Congress some fifteen or sixteen years. When I first came into the national House of Representatives, take a night session, there would be a dozen members of the other House breaking up the proceedings of the body and making it a disgrace. That thing does not exist to-day; and I say to the Senator from Missouri that he is doing grave injustice to Senators on this floor, associated with him, by the remarks which he has made, sending out the impression to the country that so many Senators in the United States Senate were drunk in the ordinary business of the Senate that the Senate was obliged to suspend its business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. FRYE. I will.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not quote me without quoting me correctly.

Mr. FRYE. I meant to have done so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I never intimated, directly or indirectly, that so many Senators were even under the influence of liquor, that business could not be transacted. I have never seen that to be the case. I think I have been as attentive a listener and observer of the proceedings of the Senate for the last ten years as any man. I have never seen anything approaching a majority of Senators in such a condition, but I have seen, and there are other Senators who have seen, some few Senators so under the inspiration and exhilaration of excitement in discussions that it was deemed best for the transaction of business to adjourn.

Mr. FRYE. Then I did misunderstand the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not intimate it. I have been at every night session and every other session, and I do say that I have seen instances when in the discussions that had sprung up here it was deemed best to adjourn in order to facilitate business. I say further, there has been within my experience a most marked and commendable change for the better.

Mr. FRYE. What I desire to say is that there never was a great reform in the history of this world which has made such immense strides forward as this same reform of temperance in the last twenty years. I say, go over to the House of Representatives this very year, or last year, or the year before, and have your night sessions, and you do not find those sessions broken up by intoxicated members of that House—not by any manner of means. I say the reform there has been perfectly amazing as well as gratifying. I have been a member of the Senate, now, for six years, and I never have seen on the floor of the Senate two United States Senators so intoxicated as to be unfit for business in my whole six years, and I am not certain that I could say I had ever seen one; and yet as Senator Cameron said, speaking of forty years ago, over one-half of the Senate every now and then was so intoxicated that a quorum could not be obtained to do business.

Sir, the advance has been gratifying; it has been immense; and I do not like to see a reform which has made such strides receive any such blows at the hands of Senators here to-day. I do not like to see it made to a certain extent a farce.

I admit that if the United States Senators all determine that not a drop of liquor of any kind, spirits, wine, or malt, or cider, shall be sold in the restaurant, it will not be sold there. I admit that on the other side of this Capitol building if every Representative in Congress determines there shall be no liquor sold in the national Capitol, it will not be sold there. But we have learned in this matter of temperance to strive to get all that we can rather than all that we want. If we can not get all we want, we will take just as near to it as we can.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the objection to my amendment, then?

Mr. FRYE. I have not alluded to the Senator's amendment. I think it would to a certain extent make a farce of that clause.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why any more a farce to punish a Senator for violating the rules of the Senate than to punish a page or a doorkeeper?

Mr. FRYE. I doubt myself the propriety of punishing a page or a doorkeeper in the proposed rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why did you report it that way?

Mr. FRYE. I did not notice that. I have only read it since the discussion opened here, because the committee reported to strike it out, and I paid no attention to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It looked to me like a very small thing to punish a little page or a doorkeeper.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will pardon me, he knows that that was the joint rule of the two Houses from 1867 to four years ago, and no page was ever punished and no messenger was ever punished under its provisions. The Senator knows perfectly well there is no danger of anything transpiring——

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why put it in?

Mr. FRYE. It is to make officers vigilant in the enforcement of this rule, if anything can make them vigilant.

So far as I am concerned, I should like to have all kinds of liquor excluded from the Capitol of the United States. I should like to have absolute prohibition in the Capitol of this great Republic. I do not believe it can be had now. Therefore, I wish to get just as near to it as I can, and I voted for this clause for the purpose of getting as near to it as I could. When you have excluded from these restaurants the strong liquors of rum, gin, brandy, and whisky, you have made one step in advance beyond anything that you ever have achieved from the day this Capitol was built to to-day.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether he would be willing to strike out the word "intoxicating" and insert in lieu the words "no spirituous or malt liquor, wine, or cider?" That is the Senator's Maine temperance pledge, as I understand it.

Mr. FRYE. The first rule ever reported to the Senate on the subject contained that very language and by a vote of the Senate it was stricken out.

I admit that so far as I am concerned I am a prohibitionist and believe in it fully, completely, thoroughly. I wish every State, and every county, and every town, and every village in the United States had prohibition and enforced it; but I recognize that other Senators have rights as well as I, and that other people have rights as well as I. I have not any fanatical mania or craziness about this sort of thing. I do not wish to do anything here that the average Senator does not wish to do. I do not wish to undertake to crowd anything down Senators which they object to. If Senators vote to exclude all these things from the Capitol, if you could have a unanimous vote to do it, they would all be excluded.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] inquired—why I do not know—where the restaurant-keeper was from, and it was replied, "from Maine," and a pleased smile spread over the face of the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. "Child-like and bland."

Mr. FRYE. "Child-like and bland," as is suggested. Now, we have prohibition in Maine. Have we not any liquor sold? Yes. Any wine sold? Yes. But we do not have the one-hundredth part so much sold as we did before we had prohibition. We have a law against stealing in Maine. Have we not any thieves? Yes. We have a law against murder. Have we not any murders? Certainly. We do not have so much stealing and so many murders as we should have if there was not a law prohibiting murder and stealing. This man was selected because I was authorized to select a restaurant-keeper, and I selected one whom I believe to be the best restaurant-keeper within my knowledge. I notice that the New York Sun said that it was on the Maine platform. I do not know who authorized the New York Sun to say that it was on the Maine platform. I have no doubt that this restaurant-keeper, being a gentleman, will obey any orders of the United States Senate strictly, and I know him well enough to know that if he says he will comply with your rule he will comply with it to the very letter. All that you have to do is to give him the rule. I can trust him in that. That he was a teetotaler I never affirmed; that he ever professed to be I never affirmed. I am not aware that I knew anything about it or inquired anything about it.

If this clause is to be sent to the other House, I hope it will be sent as it is now. If the other House assents to it I believe that under the instructions of this rule and a strict enforcement of it you will have a new order of things somewhere around this Capitol.

Mr. VEST. It is hardly to be supposed or entertained for a moment that we can enter now into a discussion of the question of prohibition. I did ask from what State the restaurant-keeper came because I knew he had been appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and I took it for granted that that Senator had selected one of his constituents who would carry out to the fullest and most literal extent his opinions upon the question of prohibition and temperance.

The Senator has gone so far as to say that prohibition has increased temperance within the State of Maine, and to a certain extent he has opened up the discussion of that question. I do not propose to follow him further than to say that the reports of the Internal-Revenue Department show that in the State of Maine, with a population about equal to that of West Virginia, prohibition obtaining in Maine and a high-license system in West Virginia, there are more saloons licensed under the laws of the United States in the State of Maine than in the State of West Virginia, and I take it that that argument is conclusive as to the effect of prohibition as a temperance agency.

So far as the selection of a constituent of the honorable Senator to take charge of the restaurant is concerned, I have simply to say that from what I have seen and heard and read of the operation of the Maine law within the State where it originated I would trust no man under heaven coming from that State upon the question of selling liquor if he could.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me just one moment, while I think of it?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that his returns touching these licenses are very misleading. Every druggist in the State of Maine gets a license. Under our law he is not allowed to sell liquor, and he gets a license even for the little alcohol which he uses in mixing medicines. I do not suppose that a little druggist can be found in the State of Maine who has not a license from the Internal Revenue Bureau to sell liquor, and yet he can not sell liquor and does not sell liquor. So far as that is concerned the Senator from Missouri is entirely mistaken.

Mr. VEST. I know something about the question of prohibition. I have met it in my own State and had occasion to examine statistics, and I have heard that explanation given. If the time should ever come in the Senate when the question is to be discussed as it ought to be, and as I hope it will be, I shall undertake to show from the statements of Neal Dow himself, the author of the law, and from the most distinguished temperance advocates in Maine, that the law is a failure; that intemperance, instead of decreasing in the very places where it ought to be decreased, in the cities, has increased, and that the law has only been operative in the rural districts where no such law is needed.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be glad to join issue with the Senator whenever that time comes.

Mr. VEST. I shall be ready to discuss it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine—I believe he is now chairman of the Committee on Rules—to some of his oversights and mistakes. I read from the Constitution, Rules, and Manual of the United States Senate, 1885:

RULE I.

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, under the direction of the presiding officer, shall be the executive officer of the body for the enforcement of all rules made by the Committee on Rules, for the regulation of the Senate wing of the Capitol.

These rules were adopted March 15, 1884, only a little over a year ago. Now I turn to Rule X:

The large private room of the restaurant shall be reserved exclusively for Senators and their guests.

The small private room shall be reserved exclusively for the use of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, and such use of the private rooms of the restaurant shall not be interfered with.

The viands served in the restaurant shall be of the best quality, and the prices for the same shall not exceed those stated in the printed bills of fare to be previously approved by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and said prices shall be subject to modification from time to time as the chairman of the Committee on Rules may direct.

Here is the Senate bill of fare, whisky and all, approved by the chairman of the Committee on Rules of the Senate, or we have a Senate restaurant-keeper who is violating the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Not whisky, but wines and malt liquors.

Mr. COCKRELL. Hold on; I am not through reading. These wines and liquors are on that bill of fare, a part and parcel of it, the prices fixed just as much as the others. But I read a little further:

The restaurant shall be kept open during the session of the Senate and during such other parts of the year as the Committee on Rules may direct.

The caterer shall give his personal attention and care to the management of the restaurant. The equipment for the tables and for the service shall be first-class.

Now, listen!

No spirituous liquors shall be sold, furnished, or kept in the restaurant.

That is a rule of the Senate. Here is the bill of fare, prepared by the restaurant-keeper selected by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and the rules require the chairman of that committee to approve this bill of fare, prices and all. The rules prohibit the selling or the keeping or the furnishing of any spirituous liquors there. Here is this bill of fare with the spirituous liquors upon it for sale, for furnishing, for giving away, kept in the restaurant by the restaurant-keeper in violation of that rule, and yet it must be done by the sanction of the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

We have rules enough on this question. Here is the rule of the Senate. It is sufficient. Let the chairman of the Committee on Rules enforce the rule. Let him make that restaurant-keeper strike from this bill of fare these spirituous liquors and take them out of the restaurant, as he has the power to do. There it is. We want no more authority. We have already given it into the hands of the Senator himself; and now we are going through the miserable farce of attempting to get a joint rule of the Senate through and taking the yeas and nays upon it, and making a parade over it, as if we were all strongly in favor of excluding spirituous liquors from use in the Senate wing of the Capitol. We already have the power. There it is. Exercise it. The Senate has delegated the power to the officers of the body, and this joint rule will give them not one particle of power they do not possess to-day. It is to me a wonderful farce.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I voted against the proposed rule under discussion, in other words, I voted to strike it out, because I think the police regulations of each House should be controlled by that House. The Senate is responsible to the country for this end of the Capitol, the other House for its end, and I do not see any reason in the world why that should go into the joint rules. If a like proposition comes up in the Senate rules, then I shall vote for it most cheerfully; but I do not propose to vote for this matter going into the joint rules, because I think it is improperly proposed to be placed there.

I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to strike out the words "exhibit or keep," for the reason that I believe the committee-rooms are just as much under the control of the Senate as the restaurant or any other part of this building. That is my view of it; but when the final vote comes I shall vote to strike out the rule as amended, because I do not believe it belongs here at all.

I wish to add a word to what has been so admirably said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]; and that was the object I had in view in seeking the floor. The country would believe from what has been said here to-day that the Senate of the United States is a band of debauchees and drunkards. I have served in many conventions and other deliberative bodies in the course of my life, and in my judgment there is not to-day in the wide world a deliberative body of men more sober than the Senate of the United States. I desire that to go out with the other statement. In the ten years I have been here I have on very few occasions, perhaps not more than two or three during the entire ten years, seen gentlemen who I thought had better be somewhere else; but for the last two or three or four years I have not seen a single instance in a night session, although we were here sometimes all night, where there was a member of the Senate who manifested himself under the slightest influence of spirituous liquor.

We know how readily and greedily everything that is said against this body or the other House is picked up and circulated, and I hope that when what has been said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] goes out to the press and the country what I have said on the same subject, having precisely the same experience as the Senator from Missouri, having been sworn in on the same day, re-elected and sworn in a second time on the same day, will go, too, as well as what the Senator from Maine has so admirably said.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to enter into this discussion. I have not seen the bill of fare alluded to here at any time, but I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether there is anything but wine or malt liquors upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I confess very frankly that I do not know enough about these things to tell what they are. There are:

SAUTERNES—

I suppose they are wines.

Mr. LOGAN. Sauterne is wine, of course.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then—

SHERRY, MADEIRA, HOCKS, CLARETS,
CHAMPAGNE,
PORT, BURGUNDY,
AMERICAN WINES,
ALES—

and then a big thing—

LIQUEURS.

I do not know whether it is similar to "liquors" or not.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator as a legal proposition, and when I speak of a legal proposition I refer to the terms applied to liquors in law. As I understand the meaning of "vinous, spirituous, and mixed liquors," the term "spirituous liquors" being used in the rule, it has not been a violation of the rule in any sense whatever if there is nothing more sold than what I have heard read on the bill of fare. I was once unfortunate enough to be a district attorney and I had to prosecute a great many cases. I used to examine occasionally the meaning of the words applicable to the different kinds of liquors and wines; and "spirituous liquors" have never been considered in law as being vinous liquors.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question as to what this thing "absinthe" is.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to answer him? It is very clear that some Senators are not prepared to legislate on this question, and it would be better to let those of us who know something about the proposition discuss it. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me to move to strike out the word "intoxicating" and insert "spirituous and malt liquors, wine, and cider," he will get at it all—all the French cordials, absinthe, and everything. I assure the Senator from Missouri that I really understand what I am discussing in connection with this matter.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate I desire to express my disapproval of this debate and of the impressions which it gives to the country. I think that it is entirely below the dignity of the Senate for such a discussion to be carried on, and it gives to the people of the country an entirely erroneous impression as to the character of the Senate and the manner in which it discharges its high legislative duty.

I concur with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. I have been here six years, and I could not for my life truthfully say that I have ever seen a single Senator under the influence of intoxicating drinks to such an extent as to be plainly and clearly observable. I declare that I have never been among a body of men with whom habitual sobriety and constant attention to their duty was more plainly characteristic than here. I think that I have been at every session of the Senate, with the exception of not more than ten, both night and day, for the last six years and a half, and I affirm that it is not true that any members of this body have ever been characterized by a want of sobriety or by the habit of using intoxicating drinks in this body and while performing their legislative duties to any observable extent.

If the declarations made in this debate, and these proposed rules, were in sympathy with any great object for the advancement of mankind, if they had for their purpose the encouragement of temperance in any practicable point of view, it might be well to consider them; but we very well know that Senators who are professing the most extreme views upon this subject are those who themselves use intoxicating liquors to a greater or less extent, although it may be within the limits of prudence and propriety, if there be such propriety.

The propositions made in this debate are far in advance of the temperance movement and are a great injury to it.

There has never been anywhere in the temperance movement a purpose to prohibit the individual from the use of intoxicating liquors within a reasonable extent, and to make the use of it a crime. The temperance movement proposes to prohibit the sale of liquor, to prohibit its exhibition in public places, to withdraw license and lawful sanction from it, but nowhere has it been made a crime in the individual to use it within the limits of sobriety and prudence, and yet we from the speeches here and these rules proclaim to the country an idea that the Senate declares that it is a crime in the individual to use intoxicating drinks in any form or to any extent, and we know that these votes and these extreme statements are intended to create a favorable opinion in the country for the individual rather than to advance the great interests of temperance in any important degree. I therefore think, sir, that it is not becoming to the Senate to lend themselves to a manifest purpose of creating a false impression upon the country.

I am willing to go as far as any other in advancing the great cause of temperance in a proper way, in creating a public opinion that is unfriendly to the use of intoxicating liquors; but I am not willing for the Senate to declare directly or indirectly that it is a criminal act in an individual to use wine or spirituous liquors to a reasonable and a prudent extent within the limits of propriety; and such seems to be the tone of the declaration here. I protest against it as unbecoming to the dignity of the Senate and an injury to the great cause of temperance, which rests upon reason and truth for its success.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the thirteenth rule as amended.

Mr. PLATT. There was an amendment voted upon just now which I have not heard reported to the Senate, and therefore do not know what it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read again.

Mr. PLATT. I am not aware that it has been reported at all, though I may be mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be again reported to the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 13:

And any Senator or Representative who may violate this rule shall be liable to expulsion.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senate understood that amendment. Certainly it is beyond the function of a joint rule to provide for the discharge of a duty, the exertion of a power, which is expressly committed by the Constitution itself to each House as it assembles, the Senate by itself, the House of Representatives, and each succeeding House as it assembles.

Mr. COCKRELL. I insist that this is out of order, and raise the point of order that my amendment was adopted and we have passed to another transaction, and the only way to reach it is by reconsideration.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose it is; under the rules of the Senate a Senator has a right to address the Chair on any subject under heaven or on earth when any other subject is up; and I am not liable to any point of order.

As I was saying when interrupted, a joint rule enacts those things which one House can not help doing hereafter, when the burden of a joint rule is upon it, without the consent of the other. The Senate can not be released, the House can not be released from a duty which it undertakes by a joint rule, if that rule be operative, without the consent of the other branch. I do not think it was understood by Senators—it certainly was not by me—that the vote was upon this proposition which the Chair has now had reported; and I hope the question will be put again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the statement made by a Senator that he did not understand the question put to the Senate, the Chair thinks it his duty to again submit the question to the Senate, as has been the usual custom, he believes. Therefore, the question is again upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], which will be again read if desired.

Mr. VEST and others. Yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon that question the yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I am in favor of the rule as reported by the committee. I am very much in favor of excluding from this building all intoxicating drinks of every character, not because I think the members of the Senate can not restrain themselves, but because I think the Senate of the United States might and ought to set an example in this matter.

I can not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, for the reason given by the Senator from Massachusetts in part, and also because the punishment is excessive. If a Senator should bring into this body a pocket-flask or a bottle, I hardly think anybody would suppose the country would justify this body in the expulsion of that Senator, even though there was a rule to that effect. The punishment, it is said, of a page or an employé by dismissal is severe. It is nothing compared with the punishment proposed by this amendment. The page may be disciplined to-day and return to-morrow. A Senator expelled is out for good, and his State is outraged, and much more perhaps than the member who has been expelled.

Of course it is the duty of every Senator to obey the rules. We understand that he ought to do it. He pledges himself as an honorable man to obey the rules. I am sorry to say that since I have been in this body I have frequently seen the rules violated with very little excuse.

I do not think that this body justly merits all that has been said about its inebriety, and yet I must admit that there is some truth in what has been stated by the Senator from Missouri. I have not for the last three years, nearly four now, been a member of this body; but nine years ago I saw scenes in this Chamber not creditable to this body growing out of the fact that Senators retired either to the restaurant or to their private rooms to consult their bottle.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Colorado if this rule was not in force at that time?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know; I think very likely it was in force; and it is impossible to make a rule upon this subject that will bind Senators or anybody else. I am in favor of temperance, but I believe after all it is a question that must be persuasively addressed to the public mind. I doubt whether you can make people temperate by law, and I speak after very much thought upon this subject, Mr. President, and I speak as a person who has never tasted in any manner or at any time either spirituous or vinous drinks. I do not believe that you can make a rule which will prevent Senators from taking wine or even that which is stronger if they see fit to do so; and yet I must exclude it from this Capitol, from the employés, and from the public gaze, but I am not willing to go to the extent of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it appears to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is entirely proper, because this rule of the Senate is not intended to punish the guilty, but merely to oppress the innocent. There is no attempt to inflict any penalty on a man for being drunk. It does not punish a man for drinking liquor. A Senator or Representative under this rule can drink all he pleases; that is not the offense; and if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri should go into effect, all that he would be punishable for would be for keeping liquor for sale in this building, becoming himself a saloon-keeper, or else keeping for exhibition or for some other purpose within the Capitol.

Sir, all the comment that has been made about the inebriety of public men is without any sort of appropriateness upon this subject, because we do not propose to deal with it by this rule. This rule has no relation whatever to a man who gets drunk and poses on this floor in a condition of inebriety. He is not the man to be punished, and if you adopt this rule, he will still not be the man to be punished, and if the rule is amended by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, all the penalty that any Senator or Representative will suffer will be in case he should open a bar in his committee-room or keep a certain selection of liquors for sale perhaps, or for exhibition, I might say, rather like that which now adorns the shelves of the Senate restaurant.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought not to be this difficulty about adopting the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. This rule is not intended for the purpose of preventing improper conduct in this Capitol, but for the purpose of producing the effect upon the country that the Senate and the House of Representatives are in favor of prohibition. This is a public declaration on the part of the Senate of the United States that they are all in favor of temperance.

That is why the yeas and nays have been repeatedly called, and that is why men who were entirely cognizant of what was being conducted in the basement of the Capitol, why men who were themselves responsible for what I had read on the back of that bill of fare, are the men who have voted in the affirmative upon the proposition to exclude liquor entirely from this Capitol, while others who voted in the negative were to be left liable to the suspicion that they were in favor of inebriety.

I have heard some suggestions, Mr. President, sotto voce, and otherwise, notably lately from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], that there were no spirituous liquors upon that card that was just now read at the Secretary's table, and that because there were no spirituous liquors on it there was no violation of the rule of this body. Sir, my experience in these matters is reasonably limited; as an eminent apostle of this subject once said, while I am in favor of temperance, I am no bigot; but my observation leads me to say that there are spirituous liquors upon that bill of fare of a very pronounced quality. Any man who is at all familiar with the liquors whose names were read in the last clause of that bill of fare is very well aware that as much absinthe or maraschino as will fill a lady's thimble is about all that an ordinary stomach can digest or an ordinary brain sustain.

I had no personal, I had no sinister or furtive purpose in causing that bill of fare to be read. I happen to be a representative of a State that has pronounced very affirmatively in favor of absolute prohibition, and I felt called upon in the discharge of my duty here to vote upon the adoption or rejection of the thirteenth rule in opposition to what might seem to be the view or demand of those who distinctly represent that sentiment, and I thought I saw here a very distinct purpose and attempt on the part of some gentlemen to create an unjustifiable public opinion, and I thought it to be my duty to show to the country that, notwithstanding the declarations which might be made here upon the adoption of the thirteenth joint rule, those who were so ready to record themselves in favor of that were at the same time entirely cognizant of practices that were absolutely in violation of it.

This exhibition this afternoon has been discreditable in the extreme. It is not a chapter of the history of this body to which members will revert with pleasure. There have been declarations made that I think had better have been qualified or omitted, and it appears to me, sir, after all that has been said upon this subject, that the best and most sensible and patriotic and just disposition of this thirteenth joint rule would be to lay it upon the table; but as I have once voted as I voted in committee to strike out the rule, I do not feel at liberty to make that motion, but I should vote for it with very great pleasure.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I merely desire to correct the Senator's reference to me. He states that I said there was no spirituous liquors on that bill. I did not say that. I asked the question of the Senator from Missouri whether there were on that bill other liquors than wines and malt beverages, and I stated that those named were understood technically as "vinous, spirituous, and mixed liquors," and that if there was not spirituous liquors on the bill the rule had not been violated. That is what I said.

Mr. HARRIS. "Vinous, spirituous, and malt," is it not?

Mr. LOGAN. Either one, "mixed" or "malt;" both words are used as applicable to that character of drinks; but they are distinctly known as three different varieties. I only mentioned that by way of interrogatory to know whether or not that was the character of the articles sold.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, as the chairman of the committee reporting this rule I stated the objections, as I said, of a majority of the committee to this clause. I stated them fairly. I stated them exactly as they were stated in committee. I reserved to myself the right to vote as I pleased. In committee I voted against striking out this clause. It was well understood by all the committee that I was in favor of a clause of this kind, that I had advocated it at a former time, and of course I had the right when the question was presented here of recording my vote as I did. I have recorded it so always whenever I have had an opportunity on a question of this kind.

Mr. President, my attention has been called to what was said to be a statement of the Senator from Missouri, that it was made the duty, by the rules, of the chairman of the committee to examine these bills and to approve them and that I had examined the bills and approved them, including the wine list. I do not think the Senator said exactly that, though he thought so.

Mr. COCKRELL. What I did say was pointing directly to you and you were looking at me—I can not recall the exact words, except that they were to the effect that you were responsible for the bill of fare.

Mr. FRYE. I am responsible for the bill of fare so far as the viands are concerned on the only bill of fare that was ever presented to me for my examination. I did examine it, and if the Senator had looked at the bill of fare that was originally placed in that restaurant and then at the one subsequently placed there he would have seen the result of my examination in more than twenty different prices that were carried out. The prices were changed and I approved of that bill of fare. No bill of fare containing wines or liquors of any kind was ever handed to me. I regarded the Committee on Rules as instructed by the United States Senate on a former occasion. When they reported a rule containing the words "spirituous and malt liquors," by a majority vote of the Senate those words were stricken out and the Committee on Rules were under instruction and their purpose was to put in here what was put in by the Senate before.

Now I say I am willing and I am desirous of getting rid of all of them, and the Senate can, if it pleases, at any time that it pleases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, when this rule was presented and the question taken on its adoption, I asked for the yeas and nays because I thought having been presented to the Senate by the Committee on Rules it would be unworthy of the Senate to vote it down; but I had another and a stronger reason. In the rule of the Senate the words "spirituous liquors" are used. I do not know but that whole list of wines might be on the bill of fare under the rule as the Senate has it now in its own rules; but this rule said "intoxicating liquors," covering everything which can intoxicate. So it was a better rule in that respect than the existing Senate rule, and therefore I desired that it should be adopted, and therefore I called for the yeas and nays, and therefore I shall now support this rule.

So much you will excuse me for saying, because under the rule now before the Senate as to intoxicating liquors there could be no bill of fare properly presented or kept which would include vinous and malt liquors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this question.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the question on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. Do Senators desire that it be read?

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of clause 13 it is proposed to add:

And any Senator or Representative who may violate this rule shall be liable to expulsion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Brown,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Morgan,
Butler,	Eustis,	Jackson,	Payne,
Cockrell,	Gibson,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Conger,	Gray,	Mahone,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	Harris,	Manderson,	Walthall.

NAYS—38.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Maxey,	Sewell,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Beck,	Frye,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Berry,	George,	Palmer,	Stanford,
Blackburn,	Gorman,	Platt,	Teller,
Call,	Hampton,	Ransom,	Vance,
Cameron,	Harrison,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Iowa,
Chace,	Hawley,	Sabin,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Colquitt,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—17.

Blair,	Hale,	McPherson,	Pugh,
Bowen,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck.
Camden,	Jones of Nevada,	Miller of N. Y.,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Pike,
Fair,	Logan,	Plumb,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, in line 6, after the word "provisions," in the rule now under consideration, to strike out all the rest of the clause, the words being:

And any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate or connive at the violation of this rule shall be dismissed from office.

My object in that is to make it harmonize with this vote of the Senate; and besides that, as most of us know, under the Constitution each House was intended to be absolutely independent of the other in regard to the control and conduct and dismissal of its own officers.

I therefore for that reason move to strike out these words so as to leave each House its constitutional power to deal with any of its officers or members who violate its own regulations according to its own will and discretion at all times.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was aiming to get the floor to make precisely the same motion which the Senator from Vermont has made, to strike out those words. I think they ought to be stricken out and ought never to have been reported there.

Mr. FRYE. This clause, as I have stated, was copied from an old joint rule exactly word for word, with the exception of putting in the word "strictly" before the word "enforce." That is the only difference between the old rule which prevailed and this rule. I fully agree with the Senator from Vermont. I never examined it with any special care, it being a copy of the old rule; but I fully agree with him that those last two lines ought to come out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to go back to Rule IX on a subject of real importance regarding legislation, but I suppose it will not be in order until this is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate voted to proceed with the rules in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I now ask to have my amendment considered. I understood the Senator from Missouri to yield to me for the purpose of offering it. The amendment is to strike out the words "intoxicating liquors" and insert "spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider." I think these words have had a legal construction. They have had in some of the States, at any rate.

If there has been anything demonstrated by the discussion here today it is that wine is not intoxicating and that beer is not. We do have wine and we do have beer in the Senate restaurant, and every Senator who goes down there and looks at those shelves understands it. It seems to me that the comprehensive way is to make it apply to spirituous or malt liquors, wine, and cider, and that does away not only with the bottles, but with the shelves themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first line of the thirteenth rule it is proposed to strike out the words "intoxicating liquors" and insert in lieu thereof the words "spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider;" so as to read:

No spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider, shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, &c.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays. I believe this is the only amendment that has not had the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Mahone,	Riddleberger,
Butler,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Cameron,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Sewell,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Teller,
Cullom,	Jones of Arkansas,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—35.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Sherman,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of Rule XIII as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. ["No!" "No!"] Then the question is on the adoption of the thirteenth rule as amended.

The rule as amended was adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Before we leave the subject, I desire to offer an addition to the Senate rule on this subject——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not be in order just now, the Senator will pardon me as I have the floor and I wish to go away. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to Rule IX with respect to conferences.

Every Senator is aware that always hitherto every committee of the Senate—and we have nothing to do as to how a committee shall be appointed in the other House—is appointed by the Senate itself. When it gives unanimous consent for the President of the Senate to appoint a conference committee or any other committee, it is the action of the Senate, because every Senator assents for convenience that it may be done. Of course at the present time when we only have a President pro tempore of the Senate liable to the action every day of the will of the Senate in removing him and replacing him with another, it is not of so much importance; but as a principle that the Senate has always stood upon, and I think rightly, it has never conferred upon the Vice-President of the United States the power to appoint any of its committees. He is merely a constitutional officer who by the Constitution presides over the deliberations of the Senate; and that is all. This ninth rule as it stands departs from that traditional history of the Senate, and from what I think is its true constitutional duty as a matter of power, and requires that every committee of conference shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, so that in a given case the Vice-President of the United States would have it in his power, in spite of the will of a majority of this body, to select for it in some most important emergency the persons who should be its representatives in a conference with the House of Representatives.

To correct this, which I think to be an error and an evil, I move to amend the ninth rule, in the second sentence of the first paragraph, where it begins, "If a conference be ordered," by striking out "the presiding officer" and inserting the word "there;" and after the word "shall," in the same line, inserting the word "be," and then striking out the word "appoint," next following, and inserting the word "appointed;" so that the clause will read:

If a conference be ordered, there shall be appointed three members as managers.

Leaving it to either House in the exercise of its constitutional powers to be its own judge for the time being, under its own rules, as to how its conferees shall be selected. Sometimes in the English practice in the House of Commons they are selected by ballot, and I am under the impression without looking it up that in the very early times in our House of Representatives they were sometimes so selected on very important questions, but I am not sure about it.

Then to carry out the same idea in the next clause, beginning "If that House insist on its amendment or amendments and agree to the proposed conference," I move to strike out after the word "conference," in the fourth line from the bottom of that first head, "the presiding officer thereof" and insert the word "there" in the place thereof; and after the word "shall" to insert the word "be;" and strike out the word "appoint" in the same line and insert "appointed;" so as to read:

If that House insist on its amendment or amendments and agree to the proposed conference, there shall be thereupon appointed three Senators or Representatives, as the case may be.

Mr. HOAR. "There shall thereupon be appointed."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; as it is suggested by my friend from Massachusetts, put the word "be" after "thereupon"—"there shall thereupon be appointed"—so as to make this clause read:

If a conference be ordered there shall be appointed three members as managers at the said conference on the part of the dissenting House, which action shall be promptly communicated to the other House. If that House insist on its amendment or amendments and agree to the proposed conference, there shall thereupon be appointed three Senators or Representatives, as the case may be, to represent the said House at said conference.

So as to leave it in the power of either House, according to its own rules of procedure, to decide how it will select its representatives.

Mr. FRYE. The only reason for the change is that clause 2 of the House rules provides that the Speaker shall appoint all select committees, and the construction has been, I think under that rule, that a conference committee was a select committee to be appointed by the Speaker, while in the Senate the usual custom—I never have known it to be otherwise since I have been here—has been to authorize the presiding officer at the time to appoint the conferees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. This rule only purposed to follow the House rule and the Senate custom. I myself, so far as I am concerned, have no manner of objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be read so that it may be understood.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the ninth rule it is proposed to amend the first paragraph, beginning after the word "House," in line 7, so as to make it read:

If a conference be ordered, there shall be appointed three members as managers at the said conference on the part of the dissenting House, which action shall be promptly communicated to the other House. If that House insist on its amendment or amendments and agree to the proposed conference, there shall thereupon be appointed three Senators or Representatives, as the case may be, to represent said House at the said conference, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to Rule XI. The Secretary will be good enough to read the last clause as it stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last clause of the rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It shall also superintend and direct the expenditure of all moneys appropriated therefor, and shall perform such other duties as are or may be directed by law or order of the two Houses, and during the period between the expiration of a Congress and the commencement of the next, all duties devolving by law or otherwise on the Joint Committee on the Library shall be performed by the members of said committee on the part of the Senate of the preceding Congress.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, every other Congress, quite as a matter of course with the coming in of a new Administration, and frequently oftener than that, the Senate meets early in March, just after the 4th of March, and then appoints its committees for the Congress according to the present rules; formerly it appointed them for the session only. Under this clause the Senate Library Committee in existence, appointed for the new Congress, can not perform the duties in vacation after the committee is appointed, but the duties would devolve on the members of the Committee on the Library of the last Congress, who might have ceased to be members of the Senate altogether, or who might have gone off that committee and on to some other.

Now, I propose to alter the rule in this way: Strike out the last four words of the printed rule, as reported from the committee, so as to make it end, "be performed by the members of said committee on the part of the Senate," and then to insert the words, "or if no such committee exist, then by the committee on the part of the Senate of the preceding Congress," so that you have somebody vested with the authority which is necessary.

Mr. FRYE. That is undoubtedly necessary, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary did not catch the amendment. The Senator will be kind enough to repeat it.

Mr. HOAR. Strike out the four last printed words of Rule XI and insert after the word "Senate:"

Or if no such committee exist, then by the committee on the part of the Senate of the preceding Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see any objection to that. On the contrary, I think it ought to be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to suggest an amendment on the line just above it to make it accurate. The words "and during the period between the expiration of a Congress and the commencement of the next" would mean the commencement of the next Congress. That would be an indescribably short period of time, because as one Congress expires another begins, and I would suggest to amend that so as to read:

During the period between the expiration of a Congress and the beginning of the first session of the next Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Would not the word "assembling" answer there?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; "on the assembling of the first session of the next Congress."

Mr. INGALLS. Why "the first session?" Why not say "the assembling of the next Congress?" They might meet in called session.

Mr. ALLISON. Strike out "commencement" and insert "assembling."

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, that will do; "assembling of the next Congress."

Mr. HOAR. Why would not the word "organization" be better than assembling?"

Mr. COCKRELL. "Organization" will do, or "assembling," either one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to strike out the word "commencement" and insert "assembling."

Mr. HOAR. These duties, I suppose, are largely the approving of small bills of expenditures that come in. They formerly involved the care of the Botanic Garden, but I think that has been removed from the Library Committee lately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They consist of supervising small labor bills and the like, and continue during the vacation.

Mr. HOAR. It is quite desirable for laborers and persons in humble life who have small claims to have somebody to audit those accounts, and therefore the "organization" of Congress, I think, would be the better term.

Mr. COCKRELL. I accept the suggestion. "Organization of the next Congress" I believe would be better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that instead of the word "commencement" in the eleventh rule, in the place stated, the word "organization" be inserted. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I endeavored to obtain the attention of the Chair to move a further amendment in Rule IX before the Senator from Massachusetts rose. I call attention to the second clause of Rule IX, about conferences, and move to strike out the words after "agreed" in the last line but one of that clause, as follows:

Unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to perfect the bill after amendment.

One of the most insidious dangers that threaten legislation, and one of the causes from which some exceedingly vicious legislation has proceeded, has been the assumption by conference committees of authority to change the text of a bill and introduce matter that had not been considered by either House when the bill was under deliberation. The text of a bill should always be changed in order to make it harmonious with the amendment before it leaves the House where the amendment is made; nothing ought to be conceded to the discretion of the conference committee; and I therefore move to strike out that clause which gives them the discretion in the words I have mentioned.

Mr. FRYE. I have had but little experience on conference committees, and I will call on some Senator who has had very much more. It seemed to the committee necessary to have that simple authority, limited and controlled as it is, given in order to make a bill correspond in language with the amendments which the conference committee had recommended. I wish the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] would inform the Senate on the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. I have had some experience in conference committees on appropriation bills, and I think it would be exceedingly difficult to carry out this provision, if those words were stricken out, on some of the appropriation bills. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Kansas that the general sense of a bill should not be changed in a conference committee, and I think that is sufficiently guarded here; but I am sure numerous instances will occur where there will of necessity be required a change in the text of a bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Why should not that change be made by the House making the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. The conference committee may modify an amendment made, for instance, in the Senate on an appropriation bill, which would require a change in the original text of the bill. I do not know that I can illustrate by any instance now, but I do not think any danger will occur from allowing the provision to stand as it is. Obviously this rule as it stands would prevent the changing of the sense of any bill. I am perfectly willing that conference committees should be absolutely restricted in that regard, and I think latterly there has been great care exercised in conference committees on appropriation bills with reference to this subject. I know some years ago one or two instances occurred where the sense of the text of a bill was changed; but I only know of one or two such instances.

Mr. INGALLS. There was one last session—I think it was the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia—in which the conference committee absolutely changed the bill as it left the House in which the amendment was made and incorporated matter which had not been considered by either House. I remember that the present occupant of the chair called the attention of the Senate to that fact and protested vigorously against what he said was undoubtedly a violation of the privilege and duty and authority of the conference committee. My object is not to allow a conference committee to take any liberties whatever with the text of a bill. If they have an inch they will take an ell. If you allow them the discretion to take whatever liberties they please with the text of a bill, to make it as they think correspond with an amendment, you simply give them all the authority they could possibly ask. While they might not be disposed to do mischief, still the liberty itself is dangerous.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] had the floor, and he yielded to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to occupy the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Kansas this question: Suppose the Senate appropriates a hundred thousand dollars for a particular purpose, and the House strikes out $100,000 and inserts $50,000, and the conference committee want to agree on $75,000, how are they going to do it under the rule as he would amend it?

Mr. ALLISON. Let me suggest still further——

Mr. INGALLS. I will take time to deliberate, and then I will answer. I do not wish to be required to give an instantaneous reply.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think you can reply, my learned and amiable brother.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator might allow me an opportunity to reply.

Mr. ALLISON. In the illustration given by the Senator from Massachusetts suppose that the conference committee requires some additional restrictions and restraints to be put about that appropriation than are contained in the text, they can not alter the text under the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. INGALLS. They ought not to be allowed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Not even in order to throw restrictions around that appropriation? Suppose, for instance, the Senate puts in an amendment making an entirely new appropriation—it has a right to do that—and that amendment goes to the House. In order to make that appropriation effective, it is found to be necessary to make some modification in the original text of the bill. It would seem to me that a conference committee ought to have that privilege.

The illustration given by the Senator from Kansas in reference to the appropriation last year or perhaps two years ago, I remember very well when the attention of the Senate was called, as I believe it was by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], to that infraction of our own rules. The Senate at once rereferred that question back to the committee of conference.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senate adopted the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. ALLISON. They did finally.

Mr. INGALLS. Exactly as the committee agreed to it.

Mr. ALLISON. They did finally, because on consultation and debate it was found on the whole to be a wise provision, as I remember. But I do not know of an instance within the last four years where a conference committee having charge of an appropriation bill has undertaken to amend the text or change its sense in any way, unless for the purpose of making some new disposition made necessary by the amendment itself. I have no wish about this, of course; but it seems to me that this provision is very well guarded as it stands, and I am quite sure that no committee will act in violation of the spirit of this rule, and if it does not the general text of a bill will not be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MANDERSON. As this seems likely to lead to some debate, and I think other of these rules will excite discussion, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fourteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 15, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. W. H. CRAIN, of Texas, appeared, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer the following resolution and ask it may lie on the table, at least until to-morrow.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December the 22d, 1885, they stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1886.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be printed and laid over.

Mr. ROGERS. I offer the following resolution for present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to employ Harry Blair Smith as a page at the Clerk's desk in the Hall, and pay him at the rate of $2 per day out of the contingent fund of the House until further orders.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say this is identical with the resolution adopted at the last Congress. There is now but one page in the office of the Clerk, who has his clerks scattered about the three floors, and an additional one is necessary. I ask for present consideration.

Mr. MORRISON. I hope my friend will consent to let this lie over until we have a committee to examine it. I do not think we should begin appropriating so early.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask that it be permitted to lie over for one day.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

IMPORTATION OF GLASSWARE.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to this House such information as he possesses, including copies of all official documents and correspondence on file in his Department, relating to the importation from Bohemia in July last, by L. Lehman, of New York, into the port of New York, of certain glassware, and to the appraisement and reappraisement of the same.

Mr. MORRISON. I must object for the present.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution will lie over for the present.

RULES.

Mr. MORRISON. With permission of the House I desire to call up for present consideration the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of privilege the gentleman from Illinois calls up the report of the Committee on Rules, which will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report of the Committee on Rules, which, with the report of the minority, was printed in yesterday's RECORD. Before he had concluded the reading,

Mr. MORRISON said: Unless there is a demand for it, I ask that the further reading of the report may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. There is not, if we shall have the opportunity of considering each particular item—an opportunity which, I think, ordinary parliamentary law would give us.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. There is no objection, then, to dispensing with the further reading of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps there will be no objection to considering these rules in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair is, of course, advised as to what are the ordinary rules of procedure when the House considers a measure as in Committee of the Whole. I suggest that this report be subject to the same consideration in the House as if the House were in Committee of the Whole under the usual rules of procedure by which the Committee of the Whole is governed.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to considering the rules in open House without referring them to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand exactly what the arrangement is.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no arrangement about considering the report as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair correctly understand the gentleman from Illinois to consent to consider the report in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; I do not consent to that; but I consent to the consideration of the report by clauses.

Mr. HOLMAN. That accomplishes the same result. I am satisfied with that.

The SPEAKER. The report then is now before the House for discussion. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I desire to make a short statement in explanation of the changes proposed by the committee of the rules as they were in force in the Forty-eighth Congress. The report of the committee is the proposition submitted by me, bettered by some changes and not very material modifications made by the Committee on Rules. There is nothing new in the proposition I submitted. I had simply grouped or put together such of the propositions as have been submitted to the House from time to time, or have been suggested by its members, as were believed to be essential to the speedy organization of the House, to the proper distribution of its work, and to more considerate and economical legislation. Other propositions which were submitted to the committee, or some of them, remain with it for further consideration.

The rules of the Forty-eighth Congress, which are in the main proposed to be adopted for the government of this, were forty-six in number. Of these it is proposed to change seven only; and some of the proposed changes are but verbal, or, as I have already suggested, but slight modifications. It will be observed that only so many of the rules as are proposed to be changed appear at length in the resolution under consideration.

The first rule it is proposed to change is number one in the system proposed to be amended. This will give control to the Speaker of the passages and corridors leading to the Hall. By the rules as they existed heretofore he was given control or supervision of the Hall of the House and the unoccupied rooms, leaving the passages and corridors uncontrolled by any officer of the House. Properly controlled, they may be made to contribute to the convenience and comfort of members or visitors; without control, they may be and are used to the annoyance of both. This authority was vested in the Speaker previous to the adoption of the rules of the Forty-sixth Congress.

The next amendment or change is proposed in Rule X. This amendment simply proposes to increase the membership of several committees. So many committees as were composed of fifteen or thirteen members are to be left as in former Congresses. The membership of some of the others heretofore composed of a less number are by the pending resolution increased to thirteen members. This will entail no additional expense or inconvenience, and will enable an increased number of members to share and participate in the responsibilities and work of important legislation.

The next rule to be changed was No. XI of the old code. This is intended to be so changed as to make some division among other committees of the labors which formerly devolved on the Committee on Appropriations alone. The appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, embracing nearly the whole personnel of the Government, for sundry civil expenses, for expenses of the District of Columbia, for fortifications, for pensions, and for all deficiencies, aggregating in amount nearly $120,000,000, or more than half of the total annual appropriations, are left with the Committee on Appropriations. It is believed by the Committee on Rules that to give diligent and considerate attention to appropriation bills appropriating such an amount of money will require all the effort and all the industry that can be found in any one committee of the House.

It has been claimed, and I believe it is insisted upon in the minority report made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], that this division or distribution of appropriation bills will result in increased expenditure. It can only do so, Mr. Speaker, if the members that constitute other committees are less intelligent, less honest, less vigilant, and less capable of performing the duties so imposed upon them. It is said, too, that the appropriations made by the committees formerly vested with this power to prepare and report appropriation bills, the Committee on Agriculture and on Rivers and Harbors, go to show that the appropriations will be increased. These two committees have had this power, and it is left with them by the report of the Committee on Rules, and five other committees are given jurisdiction of appropriation bills. I hardly need to enumerate them; they are the Military, Naval, Indian, Foreign Affairs, and Post-Office and Post-Roads.

It is said that the agricultural appropriation bills have increased since the Committee on Agriculture was given the power to prepare and report them. It may be that in some degree the expenses of the Agricultural Department have increased, since to the expenditures strictly agricultural have been added those of animal industry and forestry. I believe the whole appropriation made in the interest of agriculture is less than $600,000. One-half of our people are engaged in this industry—agriculture. I think I read something like that; I think it is in the platform. The total appropriations for this great interest amount annually to about one-twelfth part of the expenditures made for the erection of a public building in Philadelphia to tax it—about the same amount that was appropriated, given, or allowed at the last session for the erection of a public building in an interior town where one member of the Committee on Appropriations resided. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether, in the proper exercise of economy, the Committee on Appropriations, or any other committee, may or may not reduce the expenditure for the agricultural interest, but I presume that if it can be rightly done at all it will be as well done by the Committee on Agriculture as by any other.

It is said, too, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has largely increased expenditures since it was given power to report bills. The largest bill ever reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was, I believe, in the first session of the last Congress.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will permit me to correct him, the largest bill of that character was in the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. MORRISON. I am addressing myself more especially now to my Democratic colleagues, and I say, or meant to say, that the largest river and harbor appropriation bill ever reported by a Democratic committee was in the first session of the last Congress. On looking over the vote by which that bill was passed I find but four members of the committee of fifteen on appropriations recorded against it. If that Committee on Appropriations had had charge of the bill I have no doubt that the other eleven members would have outvoted the four and made the bill quite as large as it was made by the committee which had it in charge.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I wish to say to the House that the idea that the appropriations for rivers and harbors during the period from 1876 to 1880 were under the supervision of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is a mistake. Each one of those bills within the period I have mentioned was reported by the independent action of the Committee on Commerce. Therefore the assumption that extravagance grew up in those appropriations owing to their being controlled by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no foundation in fact.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the change now proposed is no new proposition with me. In the Forty-sixth Congress, when the code of rules which governed the House in the Forty-eighth was adopted, I voted in favor of a division or distribution of bills among the several committees, as now proposed. The increase of the appropriation for the agricultural interest is used as an argument to show that distribution or division will increase expenditure, and against the proposed change. The agricultural appropriation is not the only one that has increased. Why, sir, under the management of this carefully economic Democratic Committee on Appropriations the Post-Office appropriations have grown seventeen millions since the Forty-third Congress, which was a Republican Congress; then they were $33,000,000, now they are $50,000,000. I do not complain of it. I do not say that the increase may not have been a proper one. I call attention to the fact that appropriations in some Departments and for the promotion of some of the public interests will grow, and may rightly grow, whether they are reported by the Committee on Appropriations or on Agriculture.

At the time I voted to distribute appropriation bills, to which I have already referred, and as is now proposed, that most painstaking, earnest, honest man, a man most valuable to the public service, General Atkins, now Commissioner of Indian Affairs, was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. To him the public owes as much, if not more, than to any other for such reductions of expenditures as have been made since the Forty-third Congress. He was longer chairman and longer an efficient worker on the Committee on Appropriations than any member of the last five Congresses. With him at the head of the Appropriations Committee, I favored this division as I do now. Several Senators, who are, I believe, members of the Committee on Appropriations at the other end of the Capitol, have been summoned or introduced here by the minority report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] as witnesses against the policy of the proposed division.

These witnesses object to this division of bills and of legislative work because they say it will lead to extravagance. These appropriation bills ought be kept together and in the hands of a single committee, it is insisted here, in the interest of economy. Why, sir, against whom have we had to contend in the interest of economy during these long years? No President has ever vetoed an appropriation bill on the ground that the sum apportioned was too small. From whence, then, has come the obstruction we have met in the work of economy and the reduction of appropriations? It has come from that very body at the other end of the Capitol which has one committee to deal with all the appropriation bills. At all events, that is what we have been told by the Committee on Appropriations. All "riders" or legislation on appropriation bills and all rules authorizing such legislation have been justified here on the alleged necessity for compelling the legislative body from which these witnesses come to accept and agree to our reduced appropriations, and yet it is there where all appropriations are committed to a single committee; and yet members of that body are summoned to show that the appropriation bills ought to be kept together in the control and under the supervision of a single committee—here it is claimed that expenditures may be reduced; there, that reduction may be resisted!

Another amendment proposed is in Rule XXI. It is to be so amended that committees having jurisdiction of appropriation bills, or charged with preparing and reporting them, shall confine themselves to the work of appropriation, and make appropriations as required by existing law, leaving the wok of retrenchment and the framing of laws in relation thereto to the respective committees severally in charge of the different and appropriate committees. It is objected that if this right to control all the appropriations is not saved to the committee having in charge the general appropriation bills, no consent will be given at the other end of the Capitol to moderate or economic appropriations. Does anybody believe that if this Democratic House shall reduce or provide for the reduction of the amounts of money to be expended by Democratic officials a Republican Senate is going to worry itself much about increasing those amounts?

Why, sir, there is just a little selfishness in most if not in all of us. A careful inspection of the expenditures authorized by this House in the last ten years for its own officials will show that the reductions made have hardly been on a scale or kept up with the reductions made in appropriations made for expenditures in other branches of the public service.

The body of excellent gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol are not very different from their fellow-men, and in some respects may be very like those who assemble here or have met here in the Congresses of the past ten or more years, and therefore I assume that the Senate will not much exercise itself in any attempt to greatly increase any economic appropriation made here to be enjoyed or expended by officials not of their own selection.

Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment in Rule XXIII, I believe, providing that when the House, being in Committee of the Whole, proceeds to the consideration of bills not in their order, the Committee of the Whole may pass over any bill which it does not desire to consider, unless objection is made, without the necessity of rising that the House may order such bill passed over, as the old rule requires.

There is also an amendment to the twenty-first rule under which private bills must be referred to some one of the claims committees having appropriate jurisdiction—the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the Committee on Pensions, the Committee on Claims, the Committee on War Claims, the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. There is one point to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention in this connection. Paragraph 15 of Rule XI provides that the Committee on Indian Affairs shall have jurisdiction of bills in respect to the relations of the United States with the Indians and Indian tribes. The twenty-ninth and thirtieth paragraphs of the same rule provide that private and domestic claims, and demands other than war claims, against the United States shall be referred to the Committee on Claims, and claims arising from any war in which the United States has been engaged to the Committee on War Claims. What I desire to ask is whether this proposed change of the rules will take from the Committee on Indian Affairs the consideration of Indian depredation claims?

Mr. MORRISON. It is intended to do so. The power to adjudicate claims against the United States is intended to be taken away from that and all others but the Claim Committees.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The twenty-ninth paragraph of Rule XI speaks of private and domestic claims and demands other than war claims against the United States. Now, these depredation claims grow out of wars with the Indian tribes; and in view of these provisions to which I have referred, it seems to me that under the proposed amendment a great deal of confusion and disorder is likely to arise in respect to the reference of claims of this description.

Mr. MORRISON. It is intended by these amendments to the rules to leave with the Committee on Indian Affairs no power to adjudicate claims against the United States.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. No claims?

Mr. MORRISON. None against the Government. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to change, by striking out a single word, Rule XXIV, in relation to the introduction of bills and resolutions during the call of States and Territories on Mondays. We offer to strike out the word "joint" before the word "resolution," so that under this order not only joint resolutions but also concurrent and simple resolutions may be introduced. Resolutions other than joint resolutions have no place in the orders of the House under the former rules.

A provision is also inserted directing the Speaker to lay before the House for reference on each day immediately after the reading of the Journal all executive communications on his table, and also bills, resolutions, and other messages from the Senate.

There is also inserted in the twenty-fourth rule a clause providing that after the usual morning hour there shall be one hour in which the Speaker shall call the committees in order, during which hour each committee as it is called may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day; and if after two hours' consideration the bill is not disposed of, it will take its place in the order of unfinished business. It is believed that this change will enable the House to dispose more speedily of its business, and to pass many bills which under the former rules were left unconsidered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question on this point?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How are these bills called up by committees to be considered—in the House or in Committee of the Whole, or will that be determined by the character of the bill?

Mr. MORRISON. If the bill is one which under the rules must be considered in Committee of the Whole it will be necessary for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole; and there is also a provision requiring the Committee of the Whole to rise when the hour has expired. The proposed rule provides that committees when so called in their order may call up a bill on either the Union or the House Calendar.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have stated substantially all that is embraced in this report of the Committee on Rules; certainly it has been my purpose to do so; and having done this, will hear what objections may be urged against it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to address the House to-day on the subject under consideration; but there have been expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] some views which I am unwilling to have pass without immediate notice. I realize fully that my past relation to the Committee on Appropriations would seem to indicate perhaps in the minds of some that I may be peculiarly wedded to a particular control in that respect; but I am sure that those who know me best will give me the credit of acting in this matter from a pure sense of duty, having relation only to the public good. If I shall fail to impress this view upon the House, then I shall labor under an imputation which is not deserved.

The gentleman from Illinois has seen fit to allude to my views as expressed in the minority report. Let me say there is not a word in that report which reflects upon a human being. I have studiously, in and out of this Hall, endeavored to discuss and argue this question from a higher level than that of mere individuality.

I have said, with deliberation, that the tendency of a division of the labors of the Committee on Appropriations is likely to be in the direction of increasing public expenditures, and I have facts which I deem to be correct to substantiate what I have said in that regard. It is that knowledge which now induces me to reply to one matter which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has alluded to in his opening remarks in this discussion.

He has particularly spoken in reference to river and harbor bills. No one knows better than I do the pressure from within and from without in connection with river and harbor appropriation bills. There is hardly a member on this floor who does not feel and know it. I have often said we ought to have some way in this connection to protect us from ourselves when it came to making up such bills. I do say, nevertheless, that the tendency of the separation of the river and harbor appropriation bills from the Committee on Appropriations, first to the Committee on Commerce, and next to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, has been to increase the aggregate appropriations, much of which I consider to have been wasted; and in proof of that I will give in detail the figures which I have before me. I ask the Clerk to read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations for rivers and harbors.

Prior to reference of bill to Committee on Commerce:
1876	$6,648,517 50
1877	5,015,000 00
1879	8,322,700 00
1880	9,577,494 61
Committee on Commerce and Rivers and Harbors:
1881	$8,976,500 00
1882	11,451,300 00
1883	18,988,875 00
1885	14,948,300 00
Average appropriation per annum for four years prior to reference of river and harbor bill to Committee on Commerce	7,390,928 02
Average appropriation per annum since reference to Committee on Commerce	13,591,243 75

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I desire to know of the gentleman from Pennsylvania how the aggregate appropriations for rivers and harbors compare with the appropriations which have been made for railroads in money and in land.

Mr. RANDALL. My answer to that is that I have not particular knowledge on that subject, but the gentleman from West Virginia will find my vote recorded against both whenever presented in the past.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman this further question——

Mr. RANDALL. I decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state to the House what committee prepared the river and harbor bills for 1876, 1877, and 1878?

Mr. RANDALL. I have stated it all there in the paper which has been read.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I think my friend from Pennsylvania is mistaken.

Mr. RANDALL. If I am mistaken in reference to any statement made by me, I shall be glad to be corrected. No one will be more willing to make correction of any statement made by me which may be found to be incorrect.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say to the gentleman that my memory is different as to the fact.

Mr. RANDALL. I would rather go to the record than rely upon my memory.

Mr. REAGAN. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the appropriations for rivers and harbors for 1876 was reported by Mr. Hereford, then chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANDALL. I have so stated.

Mr. BLOUNT. I thought it came from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; the gentleman from Georgia will find I am accurate in my statement, and figures I have given were those from Commerce and River and Harbor Committees.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors will take care of itself.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in further illustration of this tendency to increase appropriations by distributing the work of the Committee on Appropriations, I wish to read, or cause to be read, a communication sent to this House on the 4th of March, 1882, by President Arthur. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

This leads me to offer a suggestion which I trust will commend itself to the wisdom of Congress. Is it not advisable that grants of considerable sums of money for diverse and independent schemes of internal improvement should be made the subjects of separate and distinct legislative enactments? It will scarcely be gainsaid, even by those who favor the most liberal expenditures for such purposes as are sought to be accomplished by what is commonly called the river and harbor bill, that the practice of grouping in such a bill appropriations for a great diversity of objects, widely separated, either in their nature or in the locality with which they are concerned, or in both, is one which is much to be deprecated unless it is irremediable. It inevitably tends to secure the success of the bill as a whole, though many of the items, if separately considered, could scarcely fail of rejection. By the adoption of the course I have recommended, every member of Congress, whenever opportunity should arise for giving his influence and vote for meritorious appropriations, would be enabled so to do without being called upon to sanction others undeserving his approval. So also would the Executive be afforded thereby full opportunity to exercise his constitutional prerogative of opposing whatever appropriations seemed to him objectionable, without imperiling the success of others which commended themselves to his judgment.

Mr. RANDALL. Notwithstanding the President of the United States in his annual message stated the Government had sufficient for all purposes connected with rivers and harbors, what did this House do? There was, I believe, no estimates that year for any sum necessary to carry on improvements in rivers and harbors, and yet this House, and I think the Senate, too, passed a resolution calling for estimates, and upon those estimates, when received, after the President, as I have said, had stated to Congress no money was necessary for the purpose, this House, with all the facts before it, actually passed a bill involving large expenditure.

A MEMBER. When was that?

Mr. RANDALL. That was at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress. Notwithstanding the message of President Arthur to Congress, second session, Forty-seventh Congress, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, on February 20, 1883, reported a river and harbor bill appropriating $7,987,000, which passed the House March 1 increased to $8,047,000.

I want to know whether that does not demonstrate tendency to which I have referred toward making additional and unnecessary appropriations? Nay, more, Mr. Speaker; the estimates of last year as submitted to this House by the President called for $8,000,000, and yet this House introduced and passed—introduced and considered, at least—appropriations of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 for these objects, more than four millions in excess of the estimates. And this year we have in the estimates which have been laid before us at the beginning of this session $10,000,000 for rivers and harbors. I ask any one here whether he supposes, in view of the past legislation on these subjects, the next river and harbor bill will be within the estimates as recommended by the President of the United States?

Now, sir, with this statement of facts, I am quite content to leave this particular controversy to the House and to the country, as to whether there has been a tendency to increase appropriations under these subdivisions of the powers and duties of the Committee on Appropriations as proposed here.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask my colleague, if he will permit me, a question just here.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to interrupt the course of his argument.

Mr. RANDALL. You do not interrupt me.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish, then, to ask my colleague whether any evidence has ever come to him, or to this House, that the judgment of President Arthur in recommending that there should be no river and harbor appropriation bill passed, and in his veto of that bill during the Congress before the last, was sustained by the people of this country? I ask my colleague if there is evidence of that fact? As to the question whether the Committee on Rivers and Harbors can make as judicious appropriations as the Committee on Commerce, or whether the Committee on Commerce can make as judicious appropriations for this purpose as the Committee on Appropriations, is a matter of opinion; but I ask him whether the people have sustained the President, and, if so, where is the evidence of the fact? I venture to say that there is no such evidence, because his recommendations were the most injudicious and the most uncalled-for acts of his administration, otherwise good. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of my colleague, for whom I entertain great personal respect, I have only to say that I have never had access to President Arthur's views on any subject except what I have gained in connection with his public statements and acts. As to whether the people have ever condemned this legislation, or condemned his recommendations or not, I could, if I chose, individualize instances where the struggle has taken place before the people in connection with the return of members to this body who favored these excessive appropriations, and show that under the will of the people these men have gone down.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to know where they live. Certainly they were not residents of the locality from which my colleague and myself come. His four Republican colleagues, all of whom I believe have uniformly voted for the passage of proper appropriations for rivers and harbors, have been sustained by the people and have come back to Congress. And I may say here, Mr. Speaker, in this connection, that I never believed President Arthur understood half as much about the necessity for the appropriations in connection with rivers and harbors as did the individual members from the various districts which they represented on this floor.

Mr. RANDALL. My four Republican colleagues came back; that is true. They voted for these excessive appropriations—excessive as I think, but that is a mere opinion of mine and simply goes for what it is worth. On the other hand I voted against every one of them and I came back. But I know this, that their conduct before the people was criticised and mine was not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. And I venture to say that these four Republican colleagues received more praise for their action, and the gentleman himself received less commendation than any of them.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has forty-two minutes remaining, which he yields to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Georgia will take the floor in his own right. There will be no difficulty about the time for debate on this subject, I am satisfied, between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] and myself.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

THE RULES.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I shall try to get as far as possible away from this altercation as to the views and veto of President Arthur alluded to by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL and Mr. O'NEILL]. It is very plain that he has no friends here now. [Laughter.]

There are some things in this report of the Committee on Rules and many things which I approve. There is one that does not commend itself to my judgment, and against that I desire to make some remarks. Professor Trench, in his "Study of Words," has said that we might read the history of a nation if we knew the meaning and the origin of the words in its language; and I have often thought, in glancing over the names of the committees of this House, that one might almost read in them the history of this Government were he thoroughly familiar with their names, their origin, and their component parts.

It was very natural and proper that in the beginning of the Government—in 1789—there should be a Committee on Elections. It was natural that very early—in 1794—there should be a Committee on Claims. There ought also to have been at that time a Committee on Commerce, and there was as early as 1795; then a Committee on Ways and Means in 1802, a Committee on Public Lands in 1805, and a Committee on the Judiciary in 1813, and so on. We thus might trace the growth of the country and see as it magnified how the number and capacity of these committees were increased. We have seen the Committee on Commerce embracing the subject of manufactures, and then manufactures as they grew demand a separate committee for themselves. We have seen first the Committee on Railroads and Canals, then a separate committeee on the Pacific Railroad, and when more than one great line spanned our continent it took on the plural; and so these committees have grown as the country itself has grown. In passing, one single fact needs to be mentioned as to their number: no committee has ever died.

The Committee on the Revision of the Laws was a necessity when we were revising the laws. It has passed out of need, but it lives for its chairman and its members. There is no going back. As this House increases, its committees must increase and day by day add to the expenses and to the difficulties of legislation and the administration of the Government.

Up to 1844 the Ways and Means Committee reported all appropriation bills in one bill. They then had the functions of the "committee of supply" in the House of Commons of Great Britain, which reported in the same bill the ways and means by which to run the government and the appropriations to the specific objects for which the government needed money. In 1847 they divided these appropriations into nine bills. A few years later they took on another and another and another until now, I believe, we have thirteen bills per session from the Committee on Appropriations all reported by that committee. From 1802, when the Ways and Means Committee was made, up to the 2d day of March, 1865, it had control not only of raising money but also of expending money, and of all the public debt.

The war had so changed our circumstances, had so increased the public debt and our financial necessities of legislation, that as early as 1864 it was found important to raise a committee on banking and currency. Then, in 1865, with an old man, Thaddeus Stevens, however strong mentally, feeble physically, at the head of the Ways and Means Committee, by his own consent the matter of appropriations was taken away and the matter of raising revenue only left to that great committee. It was said then that that was a necessity. We had an enormous public debt, in every form and shape, bearing various amounts of interest, payable in various ways and at different times. It was said that that was large enough with all the duties as to taxation, internal and external, to engage the full capacity of one committee, and that there should be another great committee to take the aggregate sum when brought in and distribute it according to the needs of the Government.

If we were to follow the logic of the situation to-day, with our debt adjusted, our bonds reduced to a certainty and the interest rate to a minimum, with very little left to the Ways and Means Committee except to report a bill on the tariff occasionally (which seldom becomes a law), we might vote to remand all appropriations to that committee, to which, under the law of nearly every civilized country in the world, it naturally belongs. But we will never go back. The Committee on Appropriations has been raised and the committee will exist forever.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has said that there is nothing new in his reported proposition. That is true; and yet it may be that even those who have been here some years may not see the full force of that remark. I do not know that the gentleman intended that the full force of it, as I understood it, should be seen. Not that he would conceal anything; he is far above that; but that it was not to his purpose to tell all that was not new in regard to this particular measure. I have taken the pains to cull from former debates here certain facts which will show how this matter has affected other Houses and how it has been dealt with by them.

In 1879, in April, the Committee on Commerce was permitted to report the river and harbor appropriations bill by a vote of 146 yeas to 97 nays. It was objected to at the time; but it was said in defense of the proposition that as the Committee on Commerce (which then had that jurisdiction) had to devote months to the study of the bill, they better than any other committee could make the necessary appropriations; because, it was said, it was impossible to infuse into other minds all the facts that they had acquired in reading the voluminous reports necessary to make a proper river and harbor bill.

In that session, which was the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress, a committee was appointed to revise the rules. That committee was composed of Mr. RANDALL, the then Speaker, Messrs. BLACKBURN and FRYE, now gone to the Senate, and Messrs. Stephens, of Georgia, and Garfield, now gone to a better place. These were all skilled men, all men of training both as to rules and parliamentary practice, and possessing general knowledge of the Government. They reported in favor of keeping the river and harbor bill in charge of the Appropriations Committee; but because they were not unanimous upon that subject, and because of that vote a few months before, the House agreed again to let the Committee on Commerce retain the bill and report the appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Another innovation was made. It was asked that the Committee on Agriculture should take charge of the bill making the appropriation for agriculture. I remember well the speech made on that occasion by Mr. Loring, the late Commissioner of Agriculture. He admitted the general principle that all appropriations should pass through one committee; but he took that case out of the rule by declaring that the whole scheme was tentative, that there was no law fixing just what appropriations were necessary, and that, at most, it was a case in which even if there was extravagance, it was extravagance to please the largest body of the people in the United States. With such arguments as those that proposition prevailed. But that was not all the innovations attempted. On the 8th January, 1880, Mr. Hooker, of Mississippi, offered an amendment distributing the appropriations bills to nine committees. This report distributes them to eight.

On the 15th of January Mr. Shallenberger, of Pennsylvania, offered a like division to nine committees, but slightly varied in details. After three weeks of wrangling, and mainly of abuse of the Appropriations Committee for having too much power, Mr. Muldrow, of Mississippi, profiting by the debate and guessing which way the current was running, drafted another resolution to give to the Appropriations Committee only the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, that for the consular and diplomatic service, and the sundry civil and general deficiency bills.

This report of the Committee on Rules now proposes to give to the Committee on Appropriations three of the four bills proposed by Mr. Muldrow, takes away the consular and diplomatic bill, but adds the District of Columbia and the fortifications bills. It will be observed that these two propositions, therefore, are practically the same. After a debate of nearly one month there was a vote on the former proposition. Mark you, Muldrow's included the essence of Hooker's and the essence of Shallenberger's, and after discussion all the vote it could command in the House was 24 against 83.

The fact, therefore, is that upon consideration of this question that House, without any of the present animosities existing, and considering only what was good and proper for legislation, determined that it would be unwise thus to cut up the Appropriations Committee. I was at that time a new member in Congress, and I remember very well how I was struck by a remark which I shall take the pains to quote here from Mr. Garfield. I may be permitted to quote it notwithstanding his amplified remark on the same line made at a different period in the debate, quoted by Mr. RANDALL in his minority report here. Mr. Garfield's language was this: "Let me state that the proposition to divide the Committee on Appropriations, to scatter its bills as suggested, and as once moved indeed [this was before Mr. Muldrow's motion was made], is in my judgment (although I think it now not pending) an utterly ridiculous proposition. I believe it would cost the Government twenty millions a year if the appropriations were scattered to the several committees."

It is always advantageous to invoke great names, especially when history tells us that those names belong to men who were versed in the affairs about which they spoke, and therefore I think it very proper for Mr. RANDALL to quote, as he has done in his minority report, various remarks of members of Congress which doubtless all of you gentlemen will read, and with which I will not now occupy your time. But certainly with such a vote upon the question as I have stated, and with such an array of names as the history of these debates show against the proposition reported by the Committee on Rules, that committee should have been cautious——

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. MORRISON. I simply want to say to the gentleman that I was here when the vote was taken on this question; that there were several votes taken, and that, with all the power of the Committee on Appropriations and the Republican party against us, the vote on taking away the Post-Office appropriation bill was 90 to 97; on giving the military bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, 93 to 107; and the vote on taking away the naval appropriation bill and giving it to the Committee on Naval Affairs was somewhere between the figures I have given.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for recalling to my recollection what I did not remember, the fact that in various ways, in detail as well as wholesale, this proposition was voted down in the House. The majorities on the different branches of the proposition differed because of peculiar circumstances. Perhaps on that occasion, as now, gentlemen were reminded that it would add to their importance if their respective committees were given this extra power. That may have had the effect of making some gentlemen "drum" for custom when the general Committee on Appropriations had no such power.

I was about to show by a mere call of names the men who so recently, as I have stated, set their faces against a proposition like this. I have named Mr. Garfield; I have named Mr. Stephens, of Georgia; Mr. Whitthorne has been mentioned; Mr. RANDALL has spoken for himself; Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey; Mr. Cox, of New York; Mr. Young, of Tennessee; Mr. REED, of Maine—all these gentlemen spoke against these propositions. And as the gentleman last named is a member of the Committee on Rules now reporting their change, I will read a few lines from his speech on that occasion.

Mr. REED. They are all you could find.

Mr. HAMMOND. They are brief, but they are quite enough for my purpose. The gentleman from Maine uses but few words to express much sense. His language on that occasion was this: "But if we say that appropriations are to be made according to law by one committee, then we have control of the great general appropriations of the Government and we know what we can appropriate, and then the other committees can carve out what is left."

In other words, the gentleman from Maine indorsed every word that had been said against this proposition by the other distinguished members of that House whom I have named.

Pursuing this list I find the names of Mr. Simonton of Tennessee, Mr. BLACKBURN of Kentucky (now Senator), Mr. Keifer of Ohio, Mr. HAWLEY of Connecticut (now Senator), Senator BECK, Senator EDMUNDS, Senator MORRILL, Senator Bayard (now Secretary of State), Senator DAWES, Senator HALE, Senator CALL, and Senator HOAR. The answer of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to this is that a great deal of the extravagance on appropriation bills has come from the Senate. That is true. But does that affect the argument here at all? Would there have been any less extravagance if there had been half a dozen appropriation committees instead of one committee listening to all comers who asked for increased appropriations?

Besides, that is a source of extravagance we can never avoid by any rule. The Constitution declares that one-fifth of the members of this House may call the yeas and nays; we can not make any rule to the contrary. The Constitution declares that a majority of the House is necessary for a quorum; we can not make any rule to the contrary. The same Constitution declares that the Senate may amend an appropriation bill as it may any other bill; and no rule that we may make can prevent the Senate from placing on an appropriation bill from the House any amendment it may desire to add. It has a constitutional right to put on such amendments; and we have only the constitutional right to vote them off. That makes it a very difficult proposition to deal with, I grant, but these remarks show that the answer of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is bad.

But I will not be drawn away from the particular item I wish to discuss. Suppose this measure be adopted. Let us look at the confusion which at once comes up in the mind of the Speaker. He is as competent to meet it as any man living, I have no doubt. Yet what confusion will there be in his mind. Take the Post-Office Committee. Shall its chairman be a man versed in postal affairs or one versed in the fiscal affairs of the Government? So with the Naval Committee; so with the Military Committee. Which is the consideration of most importance—that he who presides over these committees shall be qualified to control the appropriations for the particular Department, or shall be competent to devise measures for its enlargement or its modification or its pruning down? These two branches of duty require a different order of talent and training. The very fact of changing our rules and giving these additional functions to these committees ought to change the personnel of every one of them.

In every well-organized government in the world, so far as I know, the lower house of the legislative body receives estimates from all the departments of the governments as to their wants. These form the basis for appropriating money. How will the Appropriations Committee, with only the estimates for five bills, know how to adjust their measures to the work of seven other committees having estimates for the other seven bills? Assume that the members of these different committees are all equally intelligent, all equally honest, how is this matter to be adjusted without confusion, without clashing?

Why, sir, the very fact that the Committee on Public Buildings had the right to report in favor of the construction of a public building, and, at the same time, the Committee on Appropriations had a right in its general bill to make appropriations therefor, placed us last year in the awkward position of making in more than one instance double appropriations. The first-named committee reported a bill, which was passed, making appropriation for the erection of a public building in Richmond, Va.; and the Appropriations Committee, ignorant of what had been done (for, by the permission of the House, its members were out of the Hall when that bill was passed), made another appropriation of a similar sum for the same purpose; and the most amusing fact of all in this connection is, that the head of the Department having the matter in charge has decided that both appropriations are in force, though nobody wanted more than half of the sums appropriated. Some gentleman behind me says that the Committee on Appropriations had too much to do. That is not the point. It was not too much for one committee; it was too many committees to build one house.

Mr. HENLEY. Did not the business of the Appropriations Committee, from its large amount, require the members of that committee to absent themselves from the business here in this Hall, and was it not in this way that they were ignorant of what was going on here, and hence the mistake occurred?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not say that is not true; but the same permission to sit during the sessions of the House is given to the Committee on Commerce and to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors every session. The members of the latter committee are hardly ever in this Hall until their bill is brought in. So that, if the argument amounts to anything, if the rules be changed as asked, we must give permission to eight times fifteen members to retire while they are considering in committee proposed appropriation bills, and thus be ignorant of what the remainder of us are doing here in their absence.

Mr. Speaker, there are some few governments in the world, though they are small, that undertake to regulate this matter in a particular way; and I have sometimes thought we might profit by imitating their example. There are Belgium and Portugal, and perhaps one or two other governments, that divide up their legislative body into so many committees, and then each committee selects one man, and these selected men, called the reporters, make a central committee. This central committee reports all appropriations of money for the government. The idea is that the great appropriations committee there shall be in direct contact with each of the other committees, having accredited to it a member from each of them.

While I am speaking of the practice of other governments, I may allude to the fact that great as ours is we have fewer men on our Appropriations Committee than almost any considerable government in the world. I do not speak of England, that considers its bills only in committee of the whole. But take such a government as Italy, where the appropriations committee consists of 30 members; Germany, where the number is never less than 14, and generally up to 35; Austria, where with 360 members of the whole body they have 36 members on their appropriations committee. Perhaps it would be wise if, instead of undertaking to take work away from this committee, we would by the Belgian rule add to its number. Let the Speaker appoint one man from each of these committees to whom this report would give an appropriation bill, who shall be sent to the Appropriations Committee as an additional member, running the number up to 21 or 23. We should thus have a body with larger capacity for work and larger means for information, not hostile to, but in accord with, those other committees.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to go into the matter of the personnel of any committee or to try to defend any set of men in this Congress or another Congress. All I have to say is that if any committee, or any men on any committee, have wasted the public money or in any other way failed to perform their duty, the right thing to do is to take such men off that committee and put in their places men who will perform their duty. I do not mean to intimate that there is any such justifiable complaint; I do not believe that there is; but if such is the fact, that is the remedy. No fifteen men in this body ought ever to be big enough to compel the House to change its rules. Our rules should be founded on logic and sense and governmental experience. I have never yet heard in any assembly that objections to particular men or particular committees should change the order of transacting public business.

A good deal has been said about extravagance. In the very nature of things there must be more lavish expenditures if eight sets of men have charge of the expenditures than if a single body provides for all expenditures. Then the sense of individual responsibility would be gone; the intimate knowledge of what is going on can not exist. How can the Appropriations Committee pare down this and that and the other item, bringing them within the estimates or within the amount which the Ways and Means Committee can raise, when they do not know what is going to be done, when in the nature of things they can not know what is going to be done?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has said we are all selfish. That is true. Selfishness is the safeguard of society. It is not wrong to be selfish, but we have to guard against its excess, and we know that every committee feels that its particular work should be magnified as against every other committee's work.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I wish to know if the appropriations made against the estimates of the Department are not simply a ratio of paring down?

Mr. HAMMOND. Perhaps they are; but how many parers will you have when you are paring? The River and Harbor Committee does not know how to pare, because it does not know how deeply another's knife will cut. Some will only skin off the epidermis, and another would cut deep enough to hurt or kill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Then it is a question of who shall skin.

Mr. HAMMOND. No; not at all. It is a question of how far the people will be skinned. [Laughter.]

The Appropriations Committee is told by the great Committee on Ways and Means, "We raise so much money for you to spend, and by the estimates here are the things for which it must be spent." Having divided the committee into subcommittees to learn what is needed here, and what there, getting together all the estimates, there is unity of purpose and unity of action; but whenever you divide the Appropriations Committee you necessarily destroy both.

It is said the Committee on Appropriations has great power. It is the fault of this House if it has. The only power they have had was to put legislation on appropriation bills. This report proposes to take it away, although I do not think the words fully accomplish that purpose. Most of the delay in bringing in the appropriation bills is due to the fact that the committee is puzzled as to putting on such matters of legislation as causes study and investigation. If you will confine them to what they ought to be, a grand committee to examine these estimates and appropriate money, their bills in the main will be scissors' work performed by the clerks of the committee, and they will then need only to come here with such intimate knowledge of them as will enable them to defend them and explain them to the Committee of the Whole.

It is said they take much time, but how much time will be wasted if there are contentions between eight committees as to which shall first get in and put its arms into the Treasury? The Naval Affairs may say we want $20,000,000 this year, and we must be in a hurry, for if we wait for rivers and harbors or fortifications, and especially with Mr. Tilden's letter ready to be read by some one, we will get nothing for the Navy; we must crowd. Fortifications will say, we must crowd; Agriculture, we must crowd; and so with all the other eight committees. We will spend days after days in calling the yeas and nays—not on legislation, but on who shall have the right of way to propose legislation.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, there is much philosophy in the old rule of the Ways and Means Committee raising the revenue and appropriating it both. It is the practice, I believe, of nearly every government in the world.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me for a moment?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Georgia seems to have fallen into an error as to the functions of our Ways and Means Committee. The Ways and Means Committee report at long intervals, according to the history of our country, bills for raising revenue, and then until the season comes for reporting another bill changing the scope or system of revenue the Ways and Means Committee have nothing to do with it. The idea that each year the Ways and Means Committee provides as much money as the Appropriations Committee wants to appropriate or Congress wants to expend is a fanciful theory. It has no foundation, or at least has had none during the sixteen years I have had the honor to be on the Committee on Ways and Means. We have never heard of the Appropriations Committee intimating to the Committee on Ways and Means what amount of money they were likely to appropriate; nor have I heard, on the other hand, of the Committee on Ways and Means saying to the Committee on Appropriations, we will not give you more than so much money. I am quite sure the business men of the country would be frightened from their propriety if they were to hear it was now to be so arranged that the tariff should be changed by each Congress to meet the opinions of the Appropriations and Ways and Means Committees. The theory is a purely fanciful one.

Mr. HAMMOND. I did not say there was any such practice. I said the logic of the case made it proper for one committee to both raise and apply the money, and that most other governments so believed. I am not ignorant of the history of this Government in that regard. During the first thirty-six years of this Government there were thirty-eight ways and means bills raising revenue and thirty-eight appropriation bills reported and passed by the same committee. I grant that in later years there are statutes seemingly as fixed as the laws of the Medes and Persians by which the hands of the people are tied, by which war taxes are still fixed upon us and that we can not change them. I grant it, but that does not change the logic of my argument at all. The Ways and Means Committee, I admit, by the action of 1865 and by the subsequent history of obstruction thwarted every effort to change the law on the subject of the tariff; allowed itself to be stripped of a great deal of its power and a great deal of its importance. We only remember its struggles, but can not often speak of its triumphs. Our able head of that committee, in the last House, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee had the pleasure of reporting two bills reducing taxation and on both occasions the argument in favor of the proposition was followed by Democratic triumphs.

Mr. MORRISON was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee when Tilden was elected President——[cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" and derisive laughter on the Republican side], and he was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee when Cleveland was elected President.

Mr. Speaker, I have no other purpose possible in this matter but to aid in molding rules that will facilitate the business of the House. I have seen the blockade produced in our business by the present calendar system, and I am ready to lift it. But I have seen no evil grow out of this unity in that committee that expends the money, and I am not ready to try an experiment that so many great names and so many serious votes have pronounced against. We have a new era in the political history of this country. For a quarter of a century the other party has been in power. We have just come to the ascendant and are on trial. About the administration of the Government we have been kept in ignorance, and are necessarily green. The officering of this great Government, the management of its affairs, subjects us to a criticism that but few men would be able to stand. I am afraid to take upon us this additional burden. I am afraid to try this experiment when we have been posing for years as the party of reform and the party of economy par excellence.

Mr. HAYDEN (from his seat). "Posing!" That is good.

Mr. RANNEY (from his seat). Better say imposing.

Mr. HAMMOND. I said "posing," and the whole world has been looking at our posture, and has learned to admire and commend us, while it has driven you out of power. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I remarked that I was afraid to try this experiment, and yet I am afraid now that I ought not to have so remarked. It occurs to me that possibly there are men on that side of the House who will carelessly say that if this experiment is likely to hurt the Democratic party by all means let it be tried. But I warn you, gentlemen, to take heed of my original remark that such revolutions never go backward, and that when you shall again come into power in this Government, which God grant may be a long way off [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], you will be visited by the same trouble. I take it for granted, and I say it in conclusion, that there is and ought to be no political significance in anything we have to say to-day.

We ought to meet as a House of Representatives of the American people, and determine the best way of doing the best thing that can be done for our country. If it is right that there should be one head and one purpose to control these appropriations, let us keep it so. If it be right to aggrandize these other committees do that, not by violating logic, not by taking away from the Appropriations Committee what logically and rightfully belongs to them, but by taking away from it only the power to legislate, and thus leaving the other committees, which heretofore have been shut out somewhat in that department, to advance to their proper level. Then we will have theoretically, and I believe practically, good government. [Applause.]

Mr. SINGLETON. I shall vote for the report of the Committee on Rules, and ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments that I may give the reasons which prompt my vote.

I may premise by saying that for six years I was a member of this committee, and it will not be denied that I had every opportunity to find out its workings.

The first point I make is that this committee is overburdened with work and overtaxed with responsibility.

The annual expenses of the Government are about $250,000,000. This money passes out of the Treasury into the hands of disbursing officers through thirteen regular appropriation bills, all prepared and reported to the House by the Appropriations Committee. This money is not to be spent in bulk for any one purpose, but is to be applied to innumerable objects relating to every department of the Government.

To act understandingly, therefore, this committee must consult not only the heads of Departments but the heads of bureaus, and sometimes the subalterns of the lowest grade, to find out the efficiency of a particular system and see whether it is the best and most economical that could be adopted.

Every item of expense must be examined and every estimate closely scanned to know whether or not they are necessary and reasonable, and to enable the committee to explain them to the House.

It will be seen, then, that the labors of this committee are herculean, and that no fifteen members of this House should be required to perform the committee work of its three hundred and twenty-five members. Those of us who have served on said committee or held seats in this House in the past know that it has at every session applied for and obtained leave to sit during the sessions of the House, thus, to a certain extent, depriving the Representatives of fifteen districts of any participation in its current business. This is not fair play, either to these gentlemen or their constituents, or to the country at large, and the evil should be at once corrected.

Again, the responsibility thrown upon them is more than they should be required to bear.

Each member here represents a constituency which is interested in every general appropriation bill, and each should be allowed to assume his appropriate share of responsibility, not only in voting upon, but in the preparation of, subject-matters to be considered by this House. Why are so many committees appointed if it be not to divide the labors and responsibilities of legislation? We know it to be a fact that the acts of this committee are constantly criticised before this House; that it is charged with the usurpation of powers that belong to other committees, when, upon examination of the rules, it will be found it is very nearly moving in the orbit prescribed by the action of this House.

It is said to be the tendency of power to concentrate in the hands of the few as against the many, and this committee does not form an exception to that rule. I have ever entertained, and doubtless shall continue to entertain, the profoundest respect not only for the personnel, but for the integrity and industry of said committee, but have been compelled at times to note its encroachments upon the rights and privileges of other committees. This was done not wantonly or corruptly, however, but from a latitudinous construction of the powers actually conferred, oftentimes giving offense to members, and provoking antagonisms and angry discussions.

It may fairly be presumed that in the construction of the committees the Speaker has always selected such members for each as he thought best acquainted with the work to be done; as, for instance, for the Agricultural Committee practical agriculturists or those interested in the cultivation of the soil; for the Committee on Naval Affairs, gentlemen who have had experience or from opportunity and observation have learned something of the practical workings of this arm of the service. So also the Committee on Military Affairs is generally made up of persons who have been educated in the art of war, or have seen service in the field, and are better prepared to judge of the wants and needs of our Army than those of less education and less experience on the subject. And so on through all the committees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these several committees are expected and required to examine into and report upon all matters referred to them or that shall come within the scope of their powers. If reforms are to be instituted, they suggest them to the House. If money be needed to bring about these reforms, to strengthen or enlarge this branch of the public service, the committee is expected to say how much and how to be expended. What then, sir? Does the House take up the said report and recommendation, hear the arguments pro and con of the committee and the House, and decide upon the merits of the case, as it should do? Oh, no, sir. With one or two exceptions these committees have to go to the Committee on Appropriations and humbly ask its sanction of the report and recommendation, and very often no notice is taken of the one or the other, either because the Appropriations Committee has not the time or inclination to examine them, or, sitting as an appellate court, chooses to override the decisions of its less potent neighbors. This ought not to be so, and hence the needed change.

But there is still another grievance which towers above all others as the Alps tower above the surrounding hills. It is the power resting with said committee, and oftentimes employed by it, to arrest any legislation upon any subject which does not meet its approval. A motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider appropriation bills is always in order, and takes precedence of all other motions as to the order of business. How often have I witnessed in this House a scene like the following: A member proposes to take up for consideration a tariff-reform bill, or it may be an educational bill, a bill to pension the Mexican soldiers, a bill to improve rivers and harbors, to erect a public building at some point, or any other bill; and if it does not suit the taste of said committee to allow Congress to consider the bill proposed, a counter motion is made to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation bill, which is sure to carry, because the mover appeals to the House to first dispose of the appropriation bills to secure an early adjournment, which, with the average Congressman, his family being at home and his fences to be repaired, either literally or by metaphor, practically settles the question.

Thus we have seen time and again the fate of important measures which should have received the respectful and earnest consideration of this House consigned to failure and death by a member or members of the Appropriations Committee.

Could the work be divided among the several committees there would be no necessity for hurrying up bills and oftentimes passing them in such hot haste.

It is a well-known fact that several of the committees of this House meet only once or twice during a session and adjourn without maturing any bills or reports—all because a few committees have been placed in charge of all business of the session, and notably the Committee on Appropriations, which, like some gigantic oak of the forest, has sent out its roots and spread its branches until it has absorbed all the wealth of the soil about it and no vegetation can live and flourish in its shadow. How often does it happen toward the close of a session bills are whipped through this House under the spur of the previous question and a ten minutes' speech of some member of the Appropriations Committee, when millions of dollars are appropriated by them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not advocate the abrogation of this committee. I only desire that its labors and responsibilities be divided with others, and that its power and privileges be curtailed.

In the division of labor I would assign to the Committee on Military Affairs everything pertaining to the War Department, to our Army, and to West Point. To the Committee on Naval Affairs, everything relating to our Navy, with power to make recommendations to Congress as to the enlarging or strengthening of this arm of the service. The Naval Academy, too, should be under its inspection. To the Committee on Agriculture everything should go affecting this mammoth industry. To the Committee on Foreign Relations all our diplomatic and consular service should be referred. And to other committees I would refer appropriate subjects of legislation, with power in each to report such bills as they deem right and proper to be by the House considered without the intervention of the Appropriations Committee.

To the latter, the Committee on Appropriations, I would leave all matters relating to the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government, together with the sundry civil and deficiency bills, and I would place the said committee upon the same footing with other committees as to the time and manner of considering its bills and reports. I have never been able to see the propriety of conferring upon fifteen members of this House such despotic powers as that committee is known to possess and upon occasions has been seen to exercise. Put this committee upon an equal footing with others, first apportioning the labors and responsibilities properly, and let it be understood that every member of this House, as well the newly elected as its veterans, shall have an equal chance. Let us have no more close corporations, no more star-chamber proceedings.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, as I shall vote for the proposed amendments to the rules, I desire to say a few words upon that subject, and also upon another subject that has been brought into the debate. No one can be familiar with the proceedings of this House and the condition of its business for the last few years without knowing that the labors of the Committee on Appropriations have been too great for one committee. That is demonstrated by the fact that their bills are generally reported at so late a period of the session as to render a fair and full consideration of them entirely impracticable, even at so late a period as to have made it necessary in some instances to pass very important bills without debate or amendment under a suspension of the rules. I think, therefore, it is better to divide the labors of that committee, and I say this with all respect to the personnel of the committee as it has been heretofore constituted. I do not give great weight to the argument that a single committee must report all the appropriation bills in order that proper proportion may be observed in the appropriations for the different branches of the public service.

If we were simply engaged in a division of spoils, it might perhaps be true that such a distribution could be more equitably made by a single committee than by many. But, sir, we are engaged in a much higher duty, the duty of considering the necessities of the public service and making appropriations to carry on the Government, and each member of the House is supposed to understand the wants of the Government, especially as they are set forth to us by the President and the heads of the Departments, in messages and reports, and by the practical operation of the different Departments of the Government. Each member of this House is bound to regulate his action by the information he receives from proper sources as to the necessities of the public service; and to assume that one committee of fifteen members is essential to the economical administration of the Government is to assume that the remainder of the three hundred and twenty-five members of this House are deficient in information or deficient in patriotism. I am not prepared by any vote of mine to sanction such an idea. Each of us must stand upon his own votes here and upon the action which he takes as a Representative in making provision for the requirements of the public service. And why is it, sir, that the Military Committee, for instance, can not consider and report a bill providing means for carrying on the military establishment as well as the Committee on Appropriations can? Is there any reason? Why should the Committee on Military Affairs be more extravagant than the Committee on Appropriations? Each of them sets out to provide for the requirements of the Government in the same arm of the service. Each of them necessarily acts upon the same information and the same recommendations coming from the proper Department. It is fair to presume, then, that each will act with equal patriotism and equal intelligence. Why should one committee be regarded as likely to be more conservative or less extravagant than another? I do not understand the force of the reasoning that has been urged here on that subject. However many committees may be charged with the duty of considering and reporting appropriations, I do not believe that gentlemen upon those committees will regard it as their duty to grab all the money they can for their particular Departments. But if any committee should so far forget its real duty as to attempt to aggrandize the branch of the public service which it represents here, it is to be presumed that this House will not sanction such conduct.

Would there not be the restraint of the House in its capacity as the House to correct any attempt to enlarge beyond the proper boundaries the appropriations for the public service? Whatever committee may report the appropriation bills, it must expect its action to receive the revision of the House; and it seems to me the appropriations ought to be so divided and distributed as to get the bills reported to the House in time to enable the House to give them fair and full consideration. If it is the purpose of the House to be extravagant, that can not be controlled by the committee from which the bills may come. If it is the purpose of the House to be economical in its appropriations, it will be so, whatever committee the bills may come from.

Why, sir, many gentlemen here must remember the number of general appropriation bills that were precipitated upon the House at the close of the last session. One, the sundry civil bill, appropriating twenty-six or twenty-seven million dollars, was passed under a suspension of the rules, and without the privilege of debate or amendment. There is another feature growing out of this accumulation of appropriation bills at the close of the session: a conference committee, made up of three members of the Appropriations Committee, acting in connection with a similar conference committee on the part of the Senate, does substantially our legislation upon this subject of appropriations, and to an extent far too great for the healthful and proper action of Congress in the making of appropriations. I think we should avoid crowding the appropriation bills to the close of the session, putting them into conference without proper consideration, and letting six men settle what their terms are to be, beyond our power of control unless we consent to a called session of Congress.

These are some of the reasons which induce me to support that feature of the committee's report; and I am inclined to support most of the recommendations which they make. It has seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, very singular that in the discussion of this subject special reference has been made both by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to the appropriations for rivers and harbors of the country and to the action of the committee having charge of those appropriations. All the bills of that character which have become laws since 1876 were reported by the Committee on Commerce until the last Congress; and but one bill reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was passed by that Congress. The tone of the debate here is to sneer at the appropriations for the benefit of the rivers and harbors of this country. It is a response to the local press of New York and of other places representing the trunk railroads of this country and opposing all appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and in my judgment opposing in this manner the best and most important interests of this country.

Why, sir, when we think of the extent of our country, of its productions, of its commerce, of the volume and cost of its carrying trade, it becomes one of the great problems that Congress must deal with to cheapen that transportation for the benefit of producers and consumers alike. If you refuse to deepen and improve the harbors, if you refuse to deepen the channels of the rivers, removing obstructions and providing for larger classes of vessels with cheaper freights, you refuse to respond to one of the highest demands of the public interest in this country.

Mr. Speaker, when we contemplate the fact that to accommodate this commerce there have been nominally over seven thousand million dollars invested in railroads; when we contemplate the fact that there are more than four hundred million dollars annually paid by private capital for the improvement and repair of these systems of railroads to accommodate this commerce; when we contemplate the fact that we have twenty-eight or thirty thousand miles of internal navigation in this country, operating, by means of competition, to lower the prices of transportation, saving to producers the difference of freight and saving to the consumers of the products of the country a like amount of money, it seems to me that a statesman, it seems to me that a patriot, it seems to me that a man who loves his country, should not be found sneering at the pitiful appropriation of ten or twenty million dollars for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country. Sir, it is enough that hired newspapers, sustaining trunk roads, should denounce members of Congress and the River and Harbor Committee as "thieves;" they ought not to be sneered at here without a proper response and without a proper arraignment of the unpatriotic motives that cause such denunciation.

Why, sir, France, not so large as the State of Texas, appropriates much greater sums of money to the improvement of her harbors and her little rivers than this mighty Union receives at the hands of Congress. This is because the legislators of France are wise and patriotic enough to comprehend the interests of France and her people. If we, sir, are to listen to the arguments of the trunk railroads we shall soon be taught that the rivers, the great lakes, the harbors of this country are not to be used at all, but that we must concentrate all the mighty volume of commerce, amounting to twenty or thirty billions of dollars annually, upon the railroads and let them charge whatever price they please to the producers and burden the consumers with the same load.

I am no longer a member of the River and Harbor Committee. I went off of it by my own choice to escape the labor incident to its membership; but I know enough to realize the importance of that committee; I know enough to realize the purposes that committee may carry out in the improvement of the navigation of the country—deepening rivers and harbors, removing obstructions, lowering rates of insurance and rates of freight by producing competition with the railroads, thus securing more millions of dollars to the people in one year than this Government has ever spent to improve its rivers and harbors.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. And it is the railroads that fight us.

Mr. REAGAN. Undoubtedly it is the railroads, through their organs representing the trunk lines, demanding all the transportation, and fighting every suggestion for the improvement of the great water ways of this country. When we remember that the God of nature has supplied us with splendid and navigable rivers, traversing all parts of the country and draining the great Valley of the Mississippi, that embraces two-thirds of the population of this country and raises three-fourths of its agricultural productions, we may be excused for being astonished at occasionally finding a member from that country who thinks it very bad to appropriate for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

My judgment is that as this subject becomes understood, and as the knowledge of its public interest is revealed to the people, not many men will come to Congress who oppose giving the people the facilities they should receive from the improvement of their navigable rivers and harbors throughout the country. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. 118) for the relief of Alexander R. Lawton, of the State of Georgia; and Joint resolution (S. R. 1) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, before making a motion to adjourn I desire respectfully to give notice to those gentlemen who desire to speak upon this subject that I hope they will be ready to proceed to-morrow morning, because it is my desire, if the House will permit me to do so, to close the general debate to-morrow.

I move that the House do now adjourn.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair will lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 10th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the subject of the condition of the Northern Cheyenne Indians upon the Rosebud and Tongue Rivers, in Montana, the inadequacy of the appropriations made for their support during the current fiscal year, and requesting legislative authority for the use of certain funds indicated for their relief. The proposed legislation does not involve any additional appropriation, and the necessity for the authority requested is urgent. I therefore recommend the matter to the early and favorable consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1885.

The SPEAKER. The message will be printed and laid upon the table for the present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DANIEL indefinitely.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 101.

So the motion was not agreed to.

THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. GIBSON addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, if no gentleman desires to address the House in opposition to the report of the committee.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Are the rules before the House now for consideration to the exclusion of other business?

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged question and the House is now engaged in the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To the exclusion of any other business?

The SPEAKER. Other business, of course, could not be interjected in the consideration of the matter pending before the House. It would have to be postponed to permit of it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me ask whether the report is now open for amendment.

The SPEAKER. When a gentleman obtains the floor in his own right the Chair thinks he has the right to offer an amendment.

The gentleman from Kentucky is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. I had no expectation of offering one word on the subject now pending before this House. The debate has taken such a course, however, that I ask attention to a brief statement of facts.

The pivotal point upon which this discussion has turned seems to be the question of economy. It is contended by the honorable gentleman from the Committee on Rules who offers the minority report [Mr. RANDALL] that if these appropriation bills are distributed among seven or eight different committees the result will be extravagant and profligate expenditures of the public money. While I differ with the honorable gentleman in that opinion I would not trespass upon the time of the House except for the fact that in illustration of his argument that gentleman has seen fit to criticise the action of the committee of which I had the honor to be the chairman in the last Congress—the Committee on Rivers and Harbors In view of the important interests confided to that committee, I am unwilling that some of the statements he has made should go unchallenged to this House and to that part of the country that takes note of its proceedings. I regret to hear statements which will not stand the test of investigation, and which, although not so intended, are calculated at the very threshold of this Congress to bias the minds of its members and to prevent that fair and full consideration which every subject is entitled to.

The honorable gentleman has said that in the last House the Committee on Rivers and Harbors reported a bill for some $14,000,000. The bill as it left the committee of the House was for some $12,000,000, and $2,000,000 were added at the other end of the Capitol. No bill was passed in the last session; so that the average amount for each year of the Forty-eighth Congress, dividing the aggregate by 2, was $7,000,000. Referring to the report of the committee in the last House the gentleman tells this House that the estimate of the Secretary of War and of the Chief of Engineers was only for $8,000,000. Now, I need only——

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to state that I did not say the estimate of the engineers was for that amount?

Mr. WILLIS. I meant the estimate of the President and Secretary of War.

Mr. RANDALL. I spoke of the recommendation that came in the estimates from the President, but not of the estimates of the engineers, because they were $30,000,000, if I recollect rightly, and they are now, I believe, $42,000,000.

Mr. WILLIS. It was because the gentleman did not say that, that I believe it proper to call attention to what was laid before this House. Under the law passed on the 2d of March, 1867 (14 Statutes, page 421), it is made the duty of the Chief of Engineers from year to year to submit to Congress and to the committee charged with these appropriations a report of "the amount that can be profitably expended in the next fiscal year." In obedience to that law the Chief of Engineers—the officer of this Government who has direct charge and control of your rivers and harbors—did make his report, and I have it before me. It is a part of the regular Book of Estimates, which embraces all the official recommendations for appropriations. It occupies five of these large pages. What is it? Did he tell the last Congress that they should appropriate only $8,000,000? Did the Chief of Engineers, gathering together and analyzing the reports made by the local engineers and carefully supervising them, as his duty is—did he say to this House in the Forty-eighth Congress that you should only expend for your rivers and harbors the sum of $8,000,000?

Here is his report giving in detail and by name all the rivers and harbors to which he asks the attention of Congress.

He told this House that he could "profitably expend"—how much? That he could "profitably expend" $35,301,885; that is the amount which he, on his oath of office, informed us that he and his engineers can "profitably expend"—not profligately but profitably—for the benefit of commerce in our country. The fifteen members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, day in and day out, gave their undivided attention to these reports of the Engineer Department; and as the result of their deliberations they came into the House with a bill for $12,619,100. This House, with almost perfect unanimity, including the Committee on Appropriations, indorsed the action of that committee and passed the bill; and when the conference report was brought in this House for the first time in its history, without a division and without a single dissenting vote, acted on the conference report and thus made it a law. And thus the river and harbor bill of the Forty-eighth Congress went forth to the country with the unanimous sanction of both branches of Congress, and without criticism, even in those papers most given to criticism of such appropriations.

The honorable gentleman has referred to the action of President Arthur and to the fact that the Secretary of War, Mr. Lincoln, refused in the Forty-seventh Congress to make any estimate in the second session thereof for rivers and harbors. I am not here to speak for the Forty-seventh Congress. I was not a member of that committee at the time, nor did I vote for the bill which it reported; but I have before me a report made by that same Secretary of War that proves conclusively that he was mistaken.

When the Forty-eighth Congress met, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was hardly organized before urgent appeals were made from all directions for immediate appropriations, and all based upon the ground that the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress had made no appropriation, and that therefore there was immediate need of money that the works of the Government in progress should not go to pieces; that the plant and the employed labor should not be scattered, to be gathered together again at the loss of millions of dollars.

Our committee, desiring official information in regard to these demands, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, this same gentleman who had refused to make any estimate in the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and what was his reply? Here is his report, in which he says to the Forty-eighth Congress in the very first days of its session that there is need for four and a half million dollars at once to meet these urgent demands, and he gives a list of rivers and harbors needing immediate appropriations for "their protection and advancement." The whole amount covered by the bill to which the gentleman refers as having been rejected by the Senate was $7,000,000, and here this Secretary of War on the threshold of the Forty-eighth Congress comes in four months after the last fiscal year with an official recommendation of an appropriation more than one-half of that amount! The committee was right, the honorable Secretary of War was wrong, and the criticism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on this point is without foundation.

Now, sir, I stand here to contend that the appropriations made for rivers and harbors have not been out of proportion with the increase of the wealth, commerce, and population of the country.

The increase of the amount of appropriation for rivers and harbors may be, as the gentleman contends, great; but it has not been greater, or even as great, since they were made by the Committee of Commerce and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as it was when the Committee on Appropriations had charge. The increase as to this branch of the public service has not been one-half, ay, one-tenth, as great as many of the bureaus and Departments whose exclusive care has been with the Committee on Appropriations. To these propositions I challenge successful contradiction. Nor has this increase even remotely approximated the growth of the railroad system, upon whose exactions these improvements are intended to be a check.

The first appropriation of this kind was made in 1802 for the honorable gentleman's own constituents, when the Delaware River received the modest sum of $30,000. Since then nearly every year such appropriations have been made, growing in size with the growth of the country. Thus we find for the year ending June 30, 1871, the sum of $3,445,900 was appropriated; for 1872, $4,407,500; for 1873, $5,588,000; for 1874, $6,102,900. Passing to the year 1881, we find that $8,976,500 was appropriated; in 1882, $11,547,800; for the year ending June 30, 1883, the amount was $18,743,875; for 1884, $14,000,000. Taking the average from 1876 to the present year the annual amount appropriated for rivers and harbors is $7,000,000, and the average increase during the past ten years is a fraction over one million per annum.

This increase may seem great at first blush, but we must bear in mind that during an equal period of time—ten years—our population increased from 38,000,000 to 50,000,000. We must consider the enormous increase of production and its corresponding demand for transportation; but chiefly must we remember the wonderful progress of the railroad system, which is its great rival.

The first 20 miles of railroad were built in 1830. Between 1830 and 1850 9,000 miles of road were constructed. To-day we have a grand total of 143,503 miles, whose capitalization is $7,320,409,461; or, deducting for depreciation, &c., for allowances of every kind, put the total at four billions. How does the comparison stand? The whole amount appropriated by the Federal Government for rivers and harbors from the foundation of the Government up to the present moment, as appears from official reports, is only $150,000,000. Thus you perceive that the railroad system, upon which our system of rivers and harbors is intended to be a check, has expanded in thirty or forty years over thirty times the total amount that we have appropriated for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country. The expenditures, therefore, for these two rival systems bear no comparison with each other, either in aggregate amount or annual increase, and there is no room for invidious criticisms of this class of appropriations.

Sir, it is only necessary to refer to what our neighbors and other nations have expended for their water ways to show how utterly inadequate are the amounts we allow for similar purposes. One province alone of England, the province of India, expended in two or three years for the purpose of cheapening transportation more money than we have expended in all the States of the Union for the same purpose. The Republic of France expends every year between twenty and forty millions of dollars. Upon one harbor alone, that of Cherbourg, she has expended the magnificent sum of $100,000,000; an amount four times as great as all that we have appropriated for the improvement of all the great harbors on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard and on the great lakes of the country.

This great country out of its thirty-eight States can present a half-dozen into any one of which you might put France and England combined and then have to take out a search-warrant to find where they were. Our neighbor, Canada, expended $45,115,000 on the Welland Canal and its branches. The single State of New York expended for the Erie Canal alone $49,591,852, and other canals have cost that State over $79,000,000. Yet gentlemen talk about this appropriation of this Committee on Rivers and Harbors as an illustration of the extravagance which must result from giving to these several committees control of the appropriations relating to the subjects under their jurisdiction. I have before me a tabular statement of the expenditures of this Government for the last thirty or forty years, which I wish I had time to read. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been vested with authority over one subject. The Committee on Appropriations has had control since 1865, when it was split off from the Committee on Ways and Means, of the appropriations for all the great Departments of our Government.

How do the appropriations for these Departments or bureaus compare as to increase with the appropriations for rivers and harbors? Need I give the figures to this intelligent audience? Need I ask any gentleman to remember what your Signal Service Bureau was ten years ago when it demanded only ten thousand or twenty thousand, a bureau which now through the Committee on Appropriations demands and receives its hundreds of thousands? What was your Geological Survey ten or fifteen or twenty years ago? It cost then only fifteen or twenty or thirty thousand dollars, but now through the Appropriations Committee it commands and receives its millions of dollars. What was your Coast and Geodetic Survey a few years ago? It demanded a mere pittance, a few thousand dollars. Now it asks and receives hundreds of thousands. What committee has had charge of that? The Committee on Appropriations.

Take any of these Departments or bureaus, take the Fish Commission. What were its demands upon the purse of this country ten years ago? Nothing. What are they now? Hundreds of thousands. What committee has had charge of those appropriations? The Committee on Appropriations. Yet I will not follow the example of the distinguished gentleman and hold that committee entirely responsible. I know and I recognize the fact, which some of the members of that committee seem unwilling to recognize, that this is a great and growing country; that while in 1860 we had a population of only 38,000,000, we now look abroad upon fifty-five or sixty millions; that the necessary expenditure for our rivers and harbors, for our geological surveys, for all the different bureaus and Departments of the Government have increased with our increasing population, and the money which sufficed to carry on this Government twenty years ago will not approximate such a result now. And yet every word which has been uttered on this floor against the appropriation for rivers and harbors applies with fourfold force to the stupendous increase which, through the Committee on Appropriations, has resulted in all the branches and dependencies of our Government.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the beginning, I did not intend to take part in this discussion of the rules, but in the light of these facts I have stated I do protest here and now against any effort that would prejudge the minds and legislative consciences of this House against appropriations which I believe are more thoroughly identified with the progress, the commercial prosperity, and the general welfare of our people than any coming from the committees represented on this floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this discussion on the river and harbor bill. I presumed, sir, that the matter which we had before us was the amendment of the rules of the House of Representatives. As a new member, and speaking for myself and myself alone, I have been hoping as I sat here that some gentleman more conversant with the rules than I am would so enlighten me as to enable me to vote intelligently on the question when it came up for decision. I recognize the fact that this House is composed of three hundred and twenty-five members and that of that number one hundred and twenty-five of them were not members of the Forty-eighth Congress. I recognize the additional fact that upon the opening of this session the first vote I am called upon to cast is one involving a proposition to make a fundamental and radical change in the rules governing our deliberations and the conduct of business, and which must, when made, result either to the advantage or disadvantage of legislation by the House. I do not believe the one hundred and twenty-five gentlemen who for the first time have taken their seats here are more conversant with parliamentary law than I am, though it is barely possible I may be mistaken in that regard. I have some ordinary acquaintance with Jefferson's Manual, and I admit, so far as the rules of the House are concerned, I did hope after being here a short time I would have an opportunity to understand them better even than I do now.

But, sir, there is one proposition contained in the contemplated change which does not require a man to be conversant with parliamentary law in order to reach a proper conclusion. Any man of ordinary business intelligence, who has had any practical experience in the affairs of the country, can decide that point without being a parliamentarian. The question before this House is one of much importance, and involves the control of the expenditures of this Government, so that at the end of the fiscal year 1887 we can say to the people of this country, "We have expended no money in excess of your revenues."

I concede to all the committees among which it is proposed to distribute the various appropriation bills, that the gentlemen composing those committees are honest, able, and desirous of economizing and placing the Government where the revenues and expenditures will harmonize with each other; but, sir, I say that under the system proposed it will be an utter impossibility to apply the same check to your expenditures that would be practicable if the general question of appropriation bills were confined to one committee.

In years gone by these appropriation bills properly belonged to the Committee on Ways and Means. Now, if this House has not confidence in the organization of the Appropriations Committee, if there is anything personal in this proposed action, and I do not pretend to say there is, then I, sir, for one, would be willing to vote in favor of taking the appropriation bills away from the Committee on Appropriations and sending them back to the Committee of Ways and Means, where they were, as I have already said, for years, and until that committee was subdivided and a new Committee on Appropriations was created for the purpose of considering questions of appropriations. I think, with due deference to the gentlemen who have had so much more experience than I have had in this matter, that it would at least have been better if the proposed change of the rules had been referred to the Committee on Rules and reported back for consideration at a later date, so as to enable those who appear here for the first time to vote intelligently and not merely by proxy, as they must necessarily do under the present circumstances.

I will add, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favor of any modification or change of the rules which will expedite the business of the House, which will, in effect, give every gentleman on this floor full and fair opportunity to have considered in regular order any business which he may bring forward. To that extent I am in favor of the change proposed by the majority of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that the object of the rules of this House is to facilitate the transaction of the business confided to our care, so as to give the Representatives of the different States a fair opportunity not only to be recognized upon the floor, but also to be recognized in the legislation of this House as it is prepared by the committees of the House. My observation of the working of the House under the present system of rules is that about nine-tenths of the constituencies of this country are practically disfranchised, and that we have in this body two or three men who set themselves up, or who are set up by the rules of the House, as the only men competent to manage its affairs, or who can be trusted either on account of their capacity or on account of their honesty.

The history of political legislation for the last twenty years in this country has demonstrated the fact that nearly every legislative scandal of modern times has been found nestling in the belly of an appropriation bill. [Laughter.] I do not believe in this pretentious sort of honesty that some men set up here, that they and they alone are competent and qualified solely to manage and distribute the treasure of this country. I have yet to discover that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] or the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has ever objected to an appropriation for his own State.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. If I am mistaken, then the gentleman's objections were so slight and were so infrequent that they have not become so historical as some other of his actions. I remember standing here at the closing hours of the last session of this House, when almost every piece of legislation the whole country demanded was throttled by these gentlemen; and when they brought in their appropriation bill on the very last day of the session, and demanded that we should pass that without objection or stand the odium of an extra session, in which bill there were appropriations for public buildings in Pennsylvania, and public buildings in Indiana, and not once did we hear the gentleman from Indiana rising to make his famous objection.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman's memory is certainly defective. I resisted here on this floor every addition for any public building in that sundry civil appropriation bill; and I am at liberty to say that so far as my vote in committee was concerned I was quite consistent there with my public acts. Further let me say that there was not any appropriation in that bill, so far as I know, that I voted for in connection with Pennsylvania.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever thrust an appropriation bill into the way of an appropriation for his own State.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not consider that an intelligent question. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this, and there is not a member of this House who was here at the last session of Congress who does not know the fact, that for one week we had to stand here obeying the minority cranks and the majority cranks upon that committee in their demand that we should allow them to pass an appropriation bill. As to whether they had been able to report the bills before or, not we only know that they did not come in here until Congress was about to adjourn; and it was an absolute fact, apparent to all, that they must get the unanimous consent of the majority of the members of this House for the passage of the bill or else an extra session was thrust upon them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania in charge of that committee knows that fact and knows that we had to give way in order to allow these appropriation bills to get through. We had to appeal to Republicans and appeal to Democrats to allow the appropriation bill to pass, otherwise an extra session would be thrust upon the incoming Administration; and that was the great argument used here.

Mr. RANDALL. And a very sound one.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It was a sound one, but who made it a necessity? Was it the incapacity of the committee, or was it through bad motives? It was either the one or the other. They are either incompetent to manage the appropriation bills, or they can not be trusted on account of their motives. They had no business holding back the appropriation bills. They had no business throttling the voice of the members of this House. They should have brought their bills in and given an opportunity to pass upon them, an opportunity to legislate upon them. When the whole country was demanding a general bankrupt bill nothing could be done because the appropriation bills were in the way. When the great mercantile interests of the West were demanding cheap transportation nothing could be done for the same reason. There was no particle of remedial legislation to be had here in this House because the committee chose to thrust itself with its measures upon the House, and the remainder of the members had to sit idly in their seats, although equally responsible to their constituents, and yet not able to do one solitary thing in their behalf.

Now, look at it a moment. I say here that that Appropriations Committee is not competent to attend to all of this business. The rules of this House require and provide for from thirteen to fifteen members of that committee, and how do they do? It is subdivided into smaller committees, three or four members constituting each of the subcommittees. The subcommittees do the work, and not one solitary member of that committee, except the three or four on the particular subcommittee, know one solitary thing about what they are reporting. They can not answer any questions about the business. They are absolutely ignorant of the affairs of the House, of the committee, and of the country; and yet they come here and ask us, the great body of the people's representatives, to allow ourselves to become subservient to the reports of these three or four men, and undertake to become responsible for the bad work of the committee by passing their bills when the matter is brought before the House. And then, to add to this injury, they come forward with an insult, a positive insult to the House, and thrust it into the papers for publication, that if the ordinary members of this House are allowed to do their ordinary business, to attend to the interests of their constituents, they will be found in the interest of lobbyists and thieves, and that nobody but two or three gentlemen here on the Appropriations Committee can be trusted to legislate for the country.

Why is it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana are the only gentlemen in this country that can be trusted to handle the purse of this country? Are they any better than the ordinary members of this House? Does their record of legislation upon appropriation bills show they are any more patriotic than the balance of us? When those immense land grants were given to railroads, when those thievish appropriations were made, where was this great committee then, when the interests of the country required protection? They tell me they objected. Why was not their objection as potent then as it is now? It is potent now to stop legislation for the building up of a free navigation, but it had no power when it was confronted with railroad steals.

I want further to say this: I dissent entirely from this view that the change here proposed will increase expenditures. On the contrary, I believe if the responsibility were divided out among the members, as it ought to be divided, and if each member is made responsible to his own constituency, we will have every member upon this floor vieing with every other member in bringing about economy and wise and honest legislation. What has been the result of intrusting the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with the river and harbor appropriations? Gentlemen have attacked that committee and charged us with extravagant appropriations. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania how the appropriations for rivers and harbors compared with the immense amount of money and lands that had been given to railroads, and he did not answer me.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I never voted a dollar or an acre of land to any railroad.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I did not ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how he voted. But it is well known while he has had charge of these matters he has controlled legislation and been responsible.

Mr. RANDALL. Not in the least.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I asked him that question, and he did not answer it. He undertook to tell me he had voted thus and so. It is not the question how the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad to say the Democrats almost uniformly voted as I did in that particular.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It is not a question of how the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted or how he did not vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought it was.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir. And it is only because the gentleman thrusts himself in here and makes himself a personal feature in this discussion that he is discussed. What I desire is an amendment of the rules for the public good, not an amendment either to hurt or to help the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania how the appropriations for rivers and harbors compared with the extraordinary appropriations that had been made for railroads in this country, and he did not answer me except by saying how he had voted.

There is not a member of this House or an intelligent man in this country who does not know that millions of money and millions of acres of the public land have been given to private corporations to enable them to lay a tax upon the commerce of this country where one solitary dollar has been expended for the free navigation of our magnificent streams. And yet, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] said, "the voice of railroads is heard not only through the papers, but is heard in these halls, and every attempt made to obtain free navigation and to allow the people to get their commerce out to the water ways is attacked, and the committee intrusted with this matter is charged by innuendoes with steals and dishonest action." As one member of that committee I stand here and challenge the Appropriations Committee to a comparison with it. I challenge them to bring up their bills and the bill of the River and Harbor Committee to see which of them has most jobs in it, the one or the other.

I say that not only will the adoption of these rules bring about economy, but it will facilitate the public business. We have had the Appropriations Committee for years. They have had charge of the naval affairs of this country. They have had the charge of our coasts, and what is the condition to-day?

The American people is the greatest military power on the globe, holding in the breast of every one of its citizens a trained and a tried soldier, and has along its thousands of miles of seacoast multitudes of men that almost at a moment's notice could man a navy. Yet under the charge and direction of this Appropriations Committee our Navy has been swept off the seas, our commerce has been destroyed, and all the millions of dollars invested in our great cities lie at the mercy of any military power that chooses to send a gunboat there to attack them. Why did not this efficient committee that has had charge of this matter take care of it before? Why did you not build a navy? Why did you not look after our commerce? Why did you not protect our great cities? Why did you leave us at the mercy of any power that chooses to attack us or make us a mere laughing-stock? Am I going too far when I say that this one committee that has had charge of these things and has left the country in this condition is incompetent to manage them?

I do not care who is on the committee. I do not care whether it is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or whether it is the gentleman from Indiana with his famous objection. I do not care whether it is one man or another; I point to the history of legislation in this country.

We see all our great material interests frustrated, threatened, and jeopardized by the incapacity of this committee to provide means for their protection. But they tell us that they are going to do these things now. Will you give us a navy? Then why have you not done it in the past? Will you build up our commerce? You have had twenty years in which to do it, and you have not done it. Do you mean to tell me that these things will cost? They may cost; but what is the benefit of the Government to the people unless it be to provide for these things? We are not afraid of expenditures, provided those expenditures promote the business and the welfare of the country. Oh, these gentlemen will make expenditures freely enough when they are for the purpose of taxing the people by putting bounties into the pockets of manufacturers! They do not care about the complaints or the money of the people then. But when it comes to paying out money to provide for the protection of the great cities of this country, to build up our Navy, to revive our commerce, to bring about cheap transportation as against the railroad monopolies, then they are heard in this House in opposition to such expenditures.

The gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations, some of them, have been here for years. They have had every opportunity to bring about these reforms, every opportunity in the world; but now, with all the demands of the people for fortifications, for a navy, for commerce, we are told that all these interests which these gentlemen have neglected for years must be turned over to this same single committee if they are to be properly provided for. Suppose you pick out fifteen of the best men in this House and multiply their capacity tenfold and multiply their industry tenfold, do you imagine that any fifteen men could attend to all the great interests of this country? If so, why have all these other committees? Why have a Committee on Naval Affairs? Why have a Committee on Military Affairs? Why have a Committee on Commerce or a Committee on Indian Affairs, or any of these different committees, if there are only fifteen men in this House who are competent to manage such matters? We meet here and discuss subjects for months in our own committees, and agree upon them and report them, and then what happens? Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] either thrusts in a privileged bill and stops legislation, or, if some member introduces a bill or seeks to have one considered, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] rises in his majesty and objects. [Laughter.] So the fact is that although we stand here as the representatives of constituencies, there is scarcely one of us who really has an opportunity to be heard or to act for his constituency upon this floor. Therefore, for the simple reason that it emancipates the members of this House, that it makes each member equal, that it puts each constituency upon a fair, honest, and equal footing here, and gives every section of the country an equal right to be heard and to be felt through its representatives here, I shall vote for the proposed amendment of the rules which will destroy, as far as possible, the arbitrary and tyrannical power of this Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, lest the remarks of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] might convey the impression that there had been any omission on the part of any of the gentlemen who are now here and who were here during the period of land grants and subsidies it is due to me and to the history of this House to say that there has not been a dollar of subsidy or an acre of land given by this House since it has been under the control of the party which now controls it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, as to the personalities which the gentleman introduces, as to my thrusting myself forward here in any personal relation, the House and every member of it ought to know that I have done just the reverse. I do not deal in personalities in this House, and if anybody wants to deal with me personally he ought not to do it here.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that before I should occupy the few minutes during which I expect to detain the House the Committee on Rules would have enlightened us so far as they intend to do so touching this report, especially the two members of that committee upon this side of the House, because, able as I know them to be and earnest as they always are, it might have been in their power to have presented something that would have changed my mind as to some of these proposed amendments. But I have waited so far in vain, and as my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] announced some time ago that to-morrow he proposed to close general debate, I thought that even at this late hour in the afternoon I would submit what little I have to say upon this general question.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] stated that he had given no thought to this matter. I have made no formal preparation, but I have given some thought to the subject. All admit that these rules should be amended. All admit that this Government is so great and strong and powerful and that the demands and requirements of the people are so numerous that this House of three hundred and twenty-five members can not in six months or nine months or twelve months exhaust the business that comes before it, either under the present rules or under any rules that can be adopted. That business can be expedited, that legislation can be facilitated, that necessary appropriations can be better and more readily made by apt amendment of the rules, I have no doubt; and I shall vote with great pleasure for the recommendations of the Committee on Rules—I believe for all their recommendations except the one which proposes the creation of eight or nine committees of appropriation. As at present advised I shall not vote for that proposition. The committees on appropriations which it proposes are either too many or too few.

It is a long story, Mr. Speaker, as to how these rules got into their present condition. I will tell a part of it if gentlemen will bear with me a few moments. I well recollect, sir, that when that tidal wave swept over the country in 1874 and swept the Democratic party into this House with nearly two-thirds of the membership, the first thing done was to change the rules and to change them radically, and I think it was there that the trouble commenced. Now, whenever something goes wrong, be sure that the best thing to do is to take the back track and right the wrong, and you must do that before you can have prosperity either in matters of legislation or other matters. Picking up the first volume of the RECORD for the Forty-fourth Congress, I find that Mr. Cox, from the Committee on Rules, reported what was known as the Holman amendment to the then one hundred and twentieth rule, now the twenty-first, making legislation in order upon general appropriation bills, provided it retrenched expenditures. Prior to that time, since the first organization of the Committee on Appropriations (the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will correct me if I am mistaken), prior to that time, ever since the organization of the Government, it never had been in order upon appropriation bills reported either from the Committee of Ways and Means or the Committee on Appropriations to move, by way of amendment or otherwise, a matter of general legislation.

Yet, with this triumphant Democratic party that got into the saddle ten years ago in this House, old standing rules of that kind, as old as the Government, had no effect. The experience of the fathers demonstrated that appropriation and legislation never should go together, because when they do go together in governments like ours, or substantially like ours, the appropriation will buy through the objectionable legislation nine times out of ten. But all that passed for nothing. The report of the Committee on Rules in the Forty-fourth Congress, presented by Mr. Cox, recommended the Holman amendment. What was it?

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill—

That is, general appropriation bills—

> or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Now, I recollect that debate very well. Mr. Garfield, then the leader of this side of the House, objected to this provision. Mr. Kasson and various others objected. Mr. Kasson said:

> The objection we take to this proposition is that it deprives the House of the benefit of the deliberation of the committees that have specific portions of our jurisdiction committed to them, and practically gives to one committee the whole of that jurisdiction.

Now, what did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] say then in reply? He claimed that the Committee on Appropriations would only have the power to present bills to the House, that in the Committee of the Whole amendment and debate under the rules would be in order, and that a majority would control. What did Mr. Kasson reply?

> But my objection is that the proper committee will have no chance to consider the changes of the law.

Mr. HALE, then a member of the House, now a Senator, said:

> And when the Appropriations Committee reports to the House, it will be the only committee that comes with the authority of having examined and dissected the subject-matters embraced in its bill.

Mr. Garfield said substantially the same.

Mr. Hurlbut said:

> The proposed rule will practically abolish all committees except the Committee on Appropriations.

Still, this rule was adopted—adopted by a strict party vote. Who voted for it? Every Democrat voting in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress. Then the lion and the lamb—my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]—lay down together, and the little child led them—the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. [Laughter.] All was harmony. Yet, Mr. Speaker, then and there was opened the Pandora's box which through the succeeding ten years was to do great harm to the country, and to-day brings the Democracy upon the floor of this House, all of them substantially agreeing to wipe out the power to legislate upon appropriation bills. But not content to stop there, they come here and say, "We will commit another egregious blunder; because we committed a blunder ten years ago we will now go to the other extreme; we will not only right the wrong we committed then, but in addition we will make eight, nine, ten, or fourteen committees of appropriations, if you please, because this Committee on Appropriations, the creature of our own loins, made with power to report legislation with appropriation against the protest and vote of the Republican side of the House, has abused its privileges—has abused the privileges of the House, if you choose; therefore we will make nine, or ten, or fourteen other committees of appropriations, further to revolutionize parliamentary usages and parliamentary law." That is the proposition, as I will try to demonstrate.

Why, sir, do gentlemen recollect that while it was claimed a majority could always control, that very little harm could result from the proposition, that it was only introduced to retrench expenditures—do gentlemen recollect how pliant chairmen of Committees of the Whole from time to time ruled anything or everything in order under the amendment to that rule? Do gentlemen recollect how at the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress, the previous Congress, under the lead of the other side, having refused to appropriate the necessary means for carrying on the Government—do gentlemen recollect how under the operation of that rule a grip was placed on the throat of the Executive and he was informed that he should not have money to carry on this Government unless he submitted to legislation of the most sweeping character which would revolutionize our whole election system and otherwise radically change the laws?

Now all admit the evil. What is the remedy? There are two proposed. One to restore the rule as it was prior to the Holman amendment; the other, to distribute the general appropriation bills to several committees.

I give it as my opinion for what it is worth, that the true remedy is to let the Committee on Appropriations report the various general appropriation bills in pursuance of existing law, and at the same time take from that committee and from every one of the three hundred and twenty-five members that may compose the Committee of the Whole the power to move upon any appropriation bill any amendment changing existing law. That used to be the rule; I believe that should be the rule again. That, it appears to me, is the true remedy. Then the Appropriations Committee becomes, if you please, a mere auditing committee. You strip it of this objectionable power, this Democratic abuse, this power that you upon the other side of the House fastened upon it—ay, this abuse that even the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], who a few moments ago steeped his tongue in gall, laid his hands upon and blessed, along with the other Democratic members, during four years past.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir. It is only by a combination of the Republicans with a minority on the Democratic side that these things have been done.

Mr. CANNON. That is it, is it? I did not think that my friend from West Virginia, with a party that had 84 majority in this House in the last Congress, would plead infancy.

Now gentlemen say the Committee on Appropriations is too strong. I do not care whether you call it the Committee on Appropriations or not; I do not care what you call it; I do not know who is going to be on that committee; I do not know whether it is going to be "wiped out" or not, or left with small jurisdiction; I do not know whether you are going to have one committee or many. You may if you please give all this business back to the Committee on Ways and Means—that I am inclined to think would do as well—but I say it does not make much difference so you get fifteen or thirteen good, sound men who are willing to work. Genius is not so important on an auditing committee, but on the contrary is a disqualification. [Laughter.] You do want fifteen or thirteen men who have knowledge of accounts and the ability to find out what the law is and to take the estimates, sift them, inquire into them, and make recommendations to the House of Representatives for their consideration and action.

I think it ought to be one committee and not many, and I will tell you why. I served six years in this House as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and, at the same time, as a member of one or two minor committees. During that six years' time I had an idea that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with its business, was of more importance than any other half-dozen committees of this House. That was natural; and why? Because that great committee furnished business enough in matters of legislation alone to take up all of my time and all of the time of every other member of it. And, gentlemen, you know how natural it is when you are thinking about one subject to come to the conclusion it is the important one, and how apt you are to magnify it. That same thing might be said of every committee of this House.

"Oh," say some statesmen, "I will not have room enough for my genius to act on some of these committees." Now, let me say to all such, do not fret about that; we shall have room for all the ability and all the industry we have on any one of these committees, provided after we have matured legislation—that is, after we have amended our rules so as to enable the majority of the House of Representatives without undue obstruction to consider and pass upon proposed legislation. And when you take these eight, nine, or fourteen appropriations committees, each one will magnify its own department.

I am not here, Mr. Speaker, to abuse the Rivers and Harbors Committee, by no manner of means, nor the Committee on Commerce, nor the Committee on Agriculture, nor, indeed, any other committee. The gentleman talks about the river and harbor bill. I was one who voted for that eighteen millions in the river and harbor bill, and I went home and defended it through thick and thin. I believed there were many provisions which ought not to have been there, but on the whole I thought it was a good bill because it was liberal to great Western water ways. I remember that some of my colleagues on this side voted against it, as they had the right to do. But I say that the River and Harbor Committee, rightfully or wrongfully—rightfully, if you please—since they have had complete control of the appropriations contained in the bills reported by that committee have been largely increased. I speak of this not to find fault with that committee, but merely to show the natural tendency of magnifying a specialty. This tendency pervades all animal creation. A hen with one chicken makes more fuss than one with a dozen chickens.

How is it under the Committee on Appropriations if you will take from it the power to report legislation? It reports its appropriation bill after a full investigation of the law and estimates. Let us take the Post-Office appropriation bill for instance. It is reported from the committee, and from the moment it is reported for consideration by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the Post-Office Committee, being familiar with that subject, having in charge matters of legislation touching the Post-Office Department, will take the bill as reported and dissect it and it will be ready when it comes up for consideration to move such amendments as it may deem necessary and insist upon their adoption; so it will be with each of the other appropriation bills and with the committees having charge of the special subjects embraced in the provisions of those general appropriation bills.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But they can not increase the appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says they can not increase their appropriations. Yes, they can, provided the majority of the House can show a law for it, and if there be no law for it they ought not to be allowed to increase the appropriations. Nor do I understand these new rules permit them to increase appropriations under like circumstances in the way of amendments to appropriation bills.

So you see there are two great committees to audit and investigate these appropriations, and there is your legislative check.

Let us for a moment make an appropriations committee of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Under these proposed rules what jurisdiction has it? First, all legislation of every kind touching the Post-Office Department. What next? All appropriations for that Department. Thus it exhausts every function of this House so far as original jurisdiction is concerned for these purposes. There is no other committee in this House which can investigate or inquire under the rules, by resolution or otherwise, touching the service of that great Post-Office Department, so far as the jurisdiction of the Post-Office Committee goes, because nowhere else is jurisdiction given in reference to it.

Why, if some gentleman would rise in his place and move an investigation, or ask for certain information as to the Department, it would go under another rule that is recommended here to the Post-Office Committee, and it would depend on that committee whether it should be reported back favorably or unfavorably. That committee having the exclusive power to propose legislation, and also to report the appropriations for the service, would be an autocratic committee without any check upon it with any other committee of this House. Now, I undertake to say when you give a committee of that kind that kind of power—you may put my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] upon it, or you may put my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] upon it, or the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON], or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]—they might make fair appropriations this session, and possibly next session; but, as the years roll around, so sure as the sun rises, that committee, having exclusive jurisdiction of legislation and appropriations for that subject, would abuse its jurisdiction and magnify its department.

Why, Mr. Speaker, when you come to select the committees which are to have charge of the business of the War Department, or the Navy Department, or of the Post-Office Department, I take it, sir, that it will be your duty to select able men, that have a knowledge of these different Departments; and not only that, but men who are friendly, if you please, to the Navy of this country, to the Army of this country, and to the Post-Office Department. You ought not, sir, to pick out enemies, and I do not believe you would do so. So when you have placed the power in the hands of the friends of these various Departments, and given them this exclusive jurisdiction of legislation, and of appropriations, you have at once this abuse ready to come into this House and from Congress to Congress to run riot, blossoming and bearing the fruit of bad legislation and inordinate appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said in this discussion about the power of conference committees in settling the differences on the appropriation bills between the two Houses. Since the Holman amendment was adopted, before referred to, a bad practice in the appointment of conference committees has grown up. Prior to the Forty-fourth Congress in appointing the committees of conference the Speaker would select two from the Committee of Appropriations and one from the appropriate departmental committee for the bill under consideration. In this way the knowledge and ability of two committees were utilized in the settlement of matters of difference between the House and Senate. Since the Democratic party came into power in the House ten years ago the practice, I believe, has been to select all the conferees upon the money bills from the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that I shall not do in the discussion of this proposition—I shall not play the demagogue. I do not believe I would deceive anybody in this House if I attempted it. If I say that I am the superior in some respects touching certain matters of legislation to some gentlemen on the floor of this House, I stand here to say at the same time that I am satisfied other gentlemen on the floor of the House are my superiors touching many matters of legislation. And yet one would suppose to hear some of the speeches upon the other side that all men were cast in the same mold and had the same attainments.

I have frequently regretted, and in my earlier legislative life was somewhat disgusted, that I did not have some commanding committee positions. I never heard my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. REED] take the floor upon any subject but that I did not feel sometimes regretful that I could not crystallize an idea, if I had one, as he does, roll it up within my hands into proper shape and hurl it at the head of my opponent. But nevertheless I must take things as I find them. I have frequently regretted that I had not knowledge touching the revenues of this country, such as my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] possesses, or my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who stands before me.

Mr. MILLS. You have got it right at last. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I knew well that I would get it right [renewed laughter], yet the Speaker has never recognized my tremendous knowledge, ability, and information touching the economic questions of this country and touching the revenues, nor has he ever seen proper to designate me as a member of that great Committee on Ways and Means. What would the House say if I went around whining and saying that I am not the equal of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] or the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], because the Speaker has not placed me on that committee? Why I confess that they have more ability and experience in that line than I have. And so it is, sir, all the way through these committees.

One gentleman asked me to-day when you, Mr. Speaker, were going to make up the committees. I turned around to ask a member of the Committee on Rules when you were going to do the work of making up the committees of the House. He answered and said that you could not do the work now, because you did not know what the rules were going to be; you did not know what appropriation committees were to be provided, or whether the work of the Committee on Ways and Means was to be divided or not. Further, he replied, you must wait and see so as to get proper men to serve on the various committees as members and as chairmen for the transaction of the business of the House under the rules. That was a reasonable answer, and I have no doubt that it is the proper plan to pursue. The Speaker who would undertake to organize the House without regard to what a member's profession is, and what is his knowledge of law or want of it, his knowledge of commerce or want of it, his knowledge of ordinary business or want of it, his knowledge of banking or want of it, would, indeed, be a sorry Speaker; in fact, such a Speaker could be well dispensed with, because you could take one of the pages, blindfold him, shake up the names of all the members in a box, and let him draw out the members first who should constitute the Committee on Ways and Means, and so on through the list, if all members were equally competent for all committees. Yet to listen to the remarks of some gentlemen one would suppose there is no difference in the make-up or attainments or experience of members of this House upon any and all subjects.

I had intended during these remarks to refer to some statements of eminent men, who have had service in the House of Representatives, touching the proper functions of a committee on appropriations and of the other committees. But I am admonished now by glancing at the clock that I have been talking for nearly half an hour, and I do not know that it is necessary to do so. Suffice it to say, the Congressional debates show that such men as Garfield, Kasson, Alexander H. Stephens, the present Secretary of State Bayard, Senators EDMUNDS, BECK, and nearly all others who have had experience or studied the questions connected therewith, all claim that no appropriations committee should have the power to report general legislation upon appropriation bills, and that there should be one great central committee that would unify the work of auditing these appropriations and would report them with all the benefits resulting from harmonious action. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a portion of an article written by Mr. Garfield and published in the North American Review in 1879.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Perhaps the most reprehensible method connected with appropriation bills has resulted from a change of one of the rules of the House made in 1876, by which any general legislation germane to a bill may be in order if it retrenches expenditures.

The construction recently given to this amended rule has resulted in putting a great mass of general legislation upon the appropriation bills and has so overloaded the committee in charge of them as to render it quite impossible for its members to devote sufficient attention to the details of the appropriations proper.

If this rule be continued in force it will be likely to break down the Committee on Appropriations and disperse the annual bills to several committees so that the legislation on that subject will not be managed by any one committee nor in accordance with any general and comprehensive plan.

It is of the first importance that one strong, intelligent committee should have supervision of the whole work of drafting and putting in shape the bills for the appropriation of public money. That committee ought every year to present to Congress and the country a general and connected view of what we may fairly call our budget, showing not only the aggregate of expenditures but the general distribution of revenue to the several objects to be supported.

To accomplish this work thoroughly and comprehensively is all that any one committee can do; and any attempt to load general legislation upon their bills will be disastrous, not only to general legislation by making it fragmentary and incomplete, but especially so to the proper management of our fiscal affairs. This unwise rule furnished the temptation to the Democratic caucus to tack upon the two appropriation bills which failed at the last session of Congress the political legislation which has caused the extra session and has done more to revive the unfortunate memories of the rebellion than any political event of the last ten years.

The true policy is to separate all financial questions as far as possible from mere partisan politics and bring to their discussion and management the best intelligence of all parties.

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. CANNON. I want to read a sentence or two from an article by the late Representative (and now Senator) HOAR, from the State of Massachusetts, in the same year. Let us see what was his remedy. After discussing the methods of legislation and of making appropriations at very considerable length in this article, showing the disadvantage under which the House labored in making appropriations, he says:

I must take another occasion to deal with the question of remedy for these evils. I do not believe in radical changes in the institutions of the State contrived by doctrinaires. The practice of the House of Representatives is a growth, not a scheme. Still less would I urge a blind reverence for English examples. But if we could in some way secure a Speaker who should be absolutely independent of party it would be a great gain. If the three committees, Ways and Means, Appropriations, and Banking and Currency, could be blended in one, as formerly, the number of this committee to be at least fifteen, dividing its functions among subcommittees, the chairman never himself to have charge of an appropriation bill, but to be responsible for the order of business of the House, subject of course to the control of the body itself, a great step in efficiency would be gained.

That is what that distinguished parliamentarian and man has to say about the remedy. Instead of making from nine to fourteen committees of appropriation in the House of Representatives, abolish the one you have and let the Committee on Ways and Means perform the functions of both, as it did from the organization of the First Congress down to the year 1865.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, these rules are something more than mere theory; as Senator HOAR well said, they are a growth, not a scheme. They have been forming in the school of experience and necessity for nearly one hundred years in this country. In many respects they are like unto the procedure in the House of Commons, which was established in the conflicts between the King on the one hand and the Commons on the other, waged for over two centuries in the northern country; and now in the prejudices and conflicts of the hour, instead of applying the true remedy for your mistakes and vicious parliamentary practices of the last ten years, in the name of reform you propose to make reform impossible; you strike off the provision you put on ten years ago and prohibit general legislation on appropriation bills, and then make many appropriation committees where there should be but one. You thereby make the approaches to the Treasury smooth and easy. You give to each one of eight committees of appropriation, so far as the House is concerned, a key to the money vaults of the Treasury, with none of the ordinary or extraordinary checks usual in legislative bodies upon them. There is, in my opinion, but one result possible—reckless and unjustifiable expenditure.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word to this side of the House. I do not pretend to be a leader. I never thought I had that kind of power. I have always had plenty to do to take care of my own vote. Still I have an opinion touching the creation of one or many appropriation committees. So I modestly want to say to my friends on this side of the House, if this action is to be had let the Democrats, with their 40 majority, consummate it. While I admit it would tend to give us a temporary party advantage growing out of increased expenditure—and in many instances objectionable expenditures—yet the advantage would only be temporary. No party can have success worth having that is builded purely on the mistakes of its opponents. Success worth calling such either to individuals or parties is success that is won upon the merits—success that betters the condition of the country.

Samson, being in the minority, overthrew and destroyed his enemies when he blindly and in blindness put his back to the pillars of the temple and threw it down; but he perished with them.

A minority has its uses and duties in a legislative body. We are upon the watch-tower to point out and give notice of the mistakes of the majority, and, when called upon to act, act as we would if we had a majority—act right. In all methods of expenditure and accounting, in the preservation and perfection of rules for procedure, and of legislative checks, co-operate with any and all persons who are traveling in the right direction, for whatever party may be in power the rules of procedure should be the same. They are the implements, the tools by which appropriations and legislation should be shaped. Those that have been approved by experience and long use bring, in the hands of skilled men, shapely work. But confusion comes when the old implements are thrown aside and new ones not tried in the school of experience or necessity are substituted in their place.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to address the House to-night, but I feel that perhaps I can express my thought on the subject more satisfactorily under the influence of the vigorous and able speech made by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] than I could after the cooling influences of a night's repose. [Laughter.] For I wish to say that that gentleman has done precisely what I anticipated—he has given this House the full strength of all the argument which can be presented upon the side of the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has not that facility of utterance, that fervor of belief, that oratorical power which is possessed by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and the result in his case was that he gave us precisely the same line of objection which he made two years ago to that freedom of general legislation which he is ready to consent to here to-day.

For the last three Congresses the representatives of the people of the United States have been in irons. They have been allowed to transact no public business except at the dictation and by the permission of a small coterie of gentlemen who, while they possessed individually more wisdom than any of the rest of us, did not possess all the wisdom of this world. [Laughter.] I fully agree in the arraignment which the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] has made of the Committee on Appropriations, which has left us without a fortification, which has left us without a navy, which has in no respect responded to the needs of the country.

I, for one, believe that an appropriation unnecessarily of a dollar of this country's money for anything except the honest expenses of this Government is a shame that ought not to be permitted.

And I, for one, also believe that the safety of this country is not in the hands of any one man or any set of men, but in the general virtue of the representatives of the people, backed and watched by the people of the country themselves. My experience is that the expenditures of the United States and the laws of the United States are passed in obedience to the wishes of the people; and I believe that the largest publicity, the widest discussion should be given to all such measures; and the first preliminary is to place the investigation of the accounts of this country upon the broadest possible basis.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has well said that when the right to legislate upon an appropriation bill is taken away, the committee that reports such a bill to the House and the House that considers it are merely auditing the accounts of this country. How, then, shall we have them audited? Shall it be by a single committee of thirteen or fifteen men, or shall these accounts be audited by different committees? I suppose, gentlemen, when you were listening to my friend you pictured to yourselves a board of grave and reverend gentleman, carefully scrutinizing in full committee each item, and each member of the committee knowing all about what is going on in the way of expenditure all over this country. Oh, my friends, that is a picture of an ideal committee, not of the Committee on Appropriations as it has existed in mundane flesh. [Laughter.] How do they audit the accounts of this country? Why, they appoint subcommittees, each of which has charge of a particular bill. And how many of the gentlemen outside of the subcommittees have you seen discussing this audit in the face and eyes of the House of Representatives? Why, almost always the discussion is by the subcommittee alone. In other words, these gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee do this very thing which they think the House of Representatives can not be trusted to do: they parcel out the auditing of these accounts to small committees of their own.

My friend from Illinois says that there will be no check; that the power of legislation and the power of appropriation will be in the same committee. He forgets that there is going to be a great check in the increased intelligence of this House, in its increased information on these subjects. One department, so far as its administration is concerned, resembles in many respects other departments; and men who have been investigating the administrative character and nature of particular departments will require knowledge enough to enable them to act as checks upon each other. And, in addition to that, the Committee on Appropriations will still have jurisdiction of the deficiency bills, which will oblige them to have that knowledge and to exercise the check and supervision over the other committees that is so much needed and so much demanded.

Why should not these matters be disposed of by the respective committees, they investigating the whole subject? How can they know what legislation is necessary unless they can go to the bottom of the affairs involved? And how can a man learn anything about the workings of this Government except by the aid of labor which he performs in investigating the expenses? What are the expenses? They are the records of legislation, the records of the ultimate act itself which we do.

Hence I say there is an immense advantage in having this House thoroughly informed as to the affairs of the country by increasing the number of men who will know something about these subjects.

But, after all, what I specially congratulate this House upon is that at last we have succeeded in obtaining a unanimous House in favor of the transaction of some business other than the noble and lofty business of the Committee on Appropriations. Ever since the Forty-sixth Congress, that has been the only business we have been allowed to transact. Two years ago, my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], warned the Democratic party that all manner of evil would come upon them, that the way was going to be opened for something terrible, all the more terrible because it lacked the nice description which could have been given if it had really existed, which was going to happen if the other committees of this House should be allowed to do any sort of work. But to-day he has not a single word to say in defense of that restriction of his of general legislation in this House which has prevailed here for three Congresses.

How have we stood under the old rule of the House of Representatives? Practically, we made a lot of calendars. The committees went to work, sedulously performed their duties, and deposited the results on the calendars; and then we had to have a two-thirds vote to get at even the few we could reach at all, with an appropriation bill flung at them even then if they were not satisfactory. There is the system of legislation or non-legislation we have had.

I want to say that the system which the Committee on Rules now propose upon this matter, which has been somewhat lost sight of, is this: it is proposed that each of the committees during a second morning hour, which is provided for, shall have power to call up any bill which they may designate upon the House Calendar or the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, and continue the consideration of that bill during this morning hour on two successive days. If they can finish a bill before the expiration of their two hours they can take up others. But if a bill runs beyond two days, then, in order to prevent the clogging of unobjectionable legislation, such unfinished matter is placed back upon the Calendar, to be taken up in its order when reached; unfinished business being first on each Calendar, and each piece of unfinished business to be taken up in its order.

For my part I do not know that this will afford to the House very great relief. I do not believe that these rules as now proposed are a panacea for the evils of life. I do not believe that any system of rules can enable three hundred and twenty-five men to transact business like a board of mayor and aldermen. But this proposition will afford us some relief; and if it turns out not to furnish enough, I shall be found, as I always have been, in favor of the largest liberty which gives a majority of this House, representing a majority of the people of this country, a right to control.

Some gentlemen have been kind enough to resuscitate a youthful effort of mine, made when I was a member of the Forty-sixth Congress. "Why," says some gentleman to me, "you then said the Appropriations Committee was the be-all and end-all of things; what sort of a person are you to say anything different to-day?" Why, that is not half the extent of my offending against good sense. [Laughter.] I actually believed that our old rules, adopted in the Forty-sixth Congress, were going to furnish a sensible way of transacting business; and I would hang my head in shame to-day if I had not had such good company at that time. [Laughter.]

I do not promise the members of this House whenever they listen to me to give them wisdom of adamant. I do not promise them I shall not change my opinion when I see good reason for doing it. I only promise that I will give them honestly what my opinion is at the time. They must take their chances of its being for eternity. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DIBBLE asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. AIKEN, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY: Petition of Waddy T. James, L. W. Morgan, and W. H. Dickinson, of Virginia, for pay for horses killed in the service of the United States in Franklin County, Virginia, February 18, 1884—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FARQUHAR: Petition of James M. Smith and others, for relief of Chaplain Blake, United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Ann Turner and George Kerr, for relief—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GIFFORD: Petition for an act granting a pension to Sterne H. Fowler—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAHN: Papers relating to claim of Edward Davis, executor of Ezra Davis, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HARMER: Petition of John Dougherty, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HILL: Papers relating to the claims of Abram G. Hoyt, of the heirs of Martin Webb, and of the legal representatives of Alexander H. Brown—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition of John S. Chirum—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, petition of Francis M. Oliver—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HIRES: Petition of Samuel K. Robbins and others, for the improvement of the thoroughfare between Townsend's and Corsen's Inlets, Cape May County, New Jersey—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. JAMES: Petition of Nathaniel Moody, a soldier of war of 1812, for pension and arrears—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, petition of Isabell J. Ramsdell, for increase of pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. LAFFOON: Petition of James J. Lipscomb—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petition and papers relating to claim of W. A. Easton—to the same committee.

Also, papers relating to claim of James C. Rudd—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCREARY: Petition of John Farley, asking payment of supplies purchased by the Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MORRILL: Petition of E. B. Keck and 60 others, asking for the free coinage of silver—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, paper pertaining to the claim of Isaac A. Meyer—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. NEAL: Petition of P. R. Dabney, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RYAN: Petition of citizens of Kansas, against suspension of silver coinage—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. THOMPSON: Papers relating to the claim of Theodore J. Gillett—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1885.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be considered approved, unless objection be made.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to call attention to a matter which may appear in the Journal as it does in the RECORD. I must have been unfortunate in my language or else my remarks were not properly heard. There was laid before the Senate yesterday a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], a report of Captain Bixby, which was voluminous and of a technical character. That report was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses. My suggestion was that that committee, when they report the communication back, shall advise as to the importance of the matter therein contained, so that the Committee on Printing, when it shall come to them under the law, may have some guide to go by as to whether it is essential to print the entire document. I hope that when the report shall come from the Committee on Coast Defenses the matter will go to the Committee on Printing, that it may investigate as to the cost, and with the light of the report of the Committee on Coast Defenses as to the advisability of its printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal is correct, and stands approved.

DEATH OF VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents resolutions adopted by American citizens resident in the City of Mexico in regard to the death of the late Vice-President of the United States. If there be no objection an order will be entered to print the resolutions, which are brief, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN MEMORIAM.

Whereas the nation mourns the loss of Thomas A. Hendricks, one of America's most prominent sons, an eminent citizen, a distinguished statesman, and Vice-President of the United States; and

Whereas we recognize in the character of our late Vice-President the realization of the highest type of American citizenship; in private life, a faithful friend, kind and noble, loved and revered by all who knew him; in political life, by his sterling integrity, the courage of his convictions and devotion to principle he commanded the admiration of even his most bitter opponents; as a lawyer, sagacious, bold, and vigorous, manly and straightforward, possessing the earnestness of one who felt the importance of scrupulous fidelity to his clients, regardless of consequences; as a statesman, above party demagogism and always true to the best interests of his country, scorning resorts to expedieney and uncompromising in everything affecting the welfare of the nation. Such qualities elevated him to the second highest honor within the gift of the people, and will cause him to live in history as one of the most prominent figures in the annals of our country, and one in every way worthy of emulation.

Resolved, That the American residents of the City of Mexico hereby express their deep sense of the great loss which their country has sustained in the death of this eminent citizen, distinguished statesman, and patriotic American.

Resolved, That they tender their heartfelt sympathy to the widow and family of the deceased statesman, humbly invoking Divine assistance for their consolation; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the bereaved family, another to the United States Senate, and a third be furnished The Two Republics for publication.

Mexico, November 28, 1885.

HENRY R. JACKSON, Chairman.

J. MASTELLA CLARKE, Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of M. Krauskopf, of New York, praying for the establishment, as a branch of the Post-Office, of the United States Mail Press for the free publication of individual opinion; also that the Government legislate for the protection of the liberty of the press; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of J. I. Rodrigues, a citizen of the United States, praying for relief in the case of Cirilo Pouble, a citizen of the United States, imprisoned in Havana, Cuba, since the 23d of November, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOLPH. I hold in my hand two memorials of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, one praying for additional appropriations for the speedy completion of the improvement of the Columbia River, and the other praying for an appropriation for opening a channel sufficient for navigation in the Umpqua River, in Douglas County, Oregon. One is addressed to the Congress of the United States, and the other does not appear to be so addressed, but is evidently intended for presentation. I ask unanimous consent, as the memorials are informal, to present them for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials will be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of S. D. J. Moore, of Jefferson County, Alabama, praying for such legislation as will remove the causes of taxation in this country and prevent poverty; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present the petition of Napoleon Wabasha, and 20 others, members of the Dakota tribe of Indians of the bands known as the Santee Sioux, praying that they may be permitted, in accordance with certain treaty stipulations, to enter under the land laws of the United States the lands upon their reservation, and that they may be admitted to citizenship by proper legislation in accordance with that treaty.

The petition sets forth the history of the treaty with these people and the action of the Interior Department since the treaty of 1869. It states all these matters very clearly and succinctly, and while I do not desire to encumber the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with it, I do desire that it may be printed as a document. I therefore move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented the petition of James McCallen, of Rock Rapids, Iowa, praying that he be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Elizabeth Callaghan, of Boston, Mass. The petitioner states that she committed to the mails some 600 copies of a book, of which she was the author, directed to Catholic institutions of education throughout the country and other correspondents of hers, and that none of the books have ever reached their destination She claims compensation from the United States Government. I suppose that, although the petition may properly go to the Committee on Claims, yet as it involves a charge against the Post-Office Department of negligence, which would seem to demand grave inquiry, if it be true, on the part of the proper committee, I think it had better go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Adeline A. Coolidge, of Natick, Mass., praying to be allowed the pension granted by act of Congress to Charles W. Blodgett, late of Company I, Fourth United States Artillery; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WYCK presented the petition of John Kennedy, of Washington, D. C., praying compensation for land taken from him by the Government during the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 68) for the relief of S. B. Cranston, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 487) for the relief of Emily J. Fardy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 59) to reimburse the several States for interest paid on war loans, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 619) to provide for the free and unlimited coinage of the silver dollar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 620) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 621) to authorize a suit to settle the boundaries of the grant known as the Rancho Corte de Madera del Presidio, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 622) authorizing the issue of artificial eyes to soldiers, seamen, and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 623) to provide for the payment of bounty to certain discharged soldiers of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 624) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 625) for the relief of Louis Garon from the charge of desertion; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I introduce this bill at the request of an attorney of this District, knowing nothing about the party, who seems to be a resident of Canada and is under an alias, and I know nothing about the merits of the question. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 626) for the relief of the minor heirs of John W. King and Edward M. Lane, of Warren County, State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 627) relating to the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 628) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compensate clerks and employés for extra work performed in the exchange of bonds in the Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 629) declaring certain persons entitled to pensions, fixing the rate and regulating the proof in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 630) to provide for determining the existence and removal of inability of the President to discharge the powers and duties of his office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also introduced a bill (S. 631) for the relief of Francis Scala; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 632) to provide for the settlement of the estates of deceased Kickapoo Indians in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 633) to change the name of Uniontown to Anacostia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 634) relating to sales for taxes in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 635) to provide for the purchase of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal and harbor of refuge, connecting the waters of Green Bay with Lake Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 638) granting a pension to Mary G. Walker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 639) for the relief of L. S. Ensel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PUGH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 13) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWES introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 14) authorizing the appointment and retirement of Samuel Kramer as a chaplain in the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES. I introduce the joint resolution by request. I do not know anything about the merits of the case and do not desire to be committed one way or the other. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the accompanying papers.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask to change the reference of Senate bill 568, referring the joint claim of T. Alonzo Walker and Augusta C. Todd for proceeds of cotton to the Court of Claims for adjudication, which was introduced by me yesterday and referred to the Committee on Claims. I desire now that that committee be discharged from its consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of J. J. Pulliam's estate be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Alexander Swift & Co. and Alexander Swift & Co. and the Niles Works be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William C. Spencer (S. 662, Report No. 654, second session Forty-sixth Congress) be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, there having been no adverse report or adverse action thereupon.

CONSULAR FEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are now in order, and the Chair, under the rule, lays before the Senate the resolution which was submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and laid over. The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to cause inquiry to be made, and to inform the Senate, whether or not any consular officer or commercial agent of the United States is now, or has been since 1868, personally interested in, or benefited by, the fees paid to the notarial, consular, or commercial officials of any other nation for oaths administered or verifications made on invoices destined to the United States; and if any are or have been so interested or benefited, to report the amount of such benefit or interest as to each officer or agent.

Mr. INGALLS. Who introduced the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], yesterday. It lay over under the rule, and comes up in order this morning.

Mr. BECK. I will state the object I have in view in calling for this information. We have been for several years endeavoring to build up our carrying trade by lightening the burdens on our commerce. This was aided very much in the last Congress by the bill introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. More is still needed. I introduced a bill yesterday prohibiting the charge of more than two and a half dollars for the authentication, certification, or any other steps taken toward the verification of invoices on goods coming to this country, which I think will still further reduce the present burdens and enable us to compete more successfully with the people of other countries.

I have information, upon which I think I can rely, that many of our efforts have been and are still rendered less useful than they otherwise would be by the practice of our consular agents, in cases where they can not legally charge fees, obtaining the consuls of other countries to aid in the necessary certification and make charges in which our officials share. I desire to put an end to that practice if I can. If my information is not correct, so much the better; if it is true, if these things are done, then I desire to amend the bill I offered on yesterday, and send the amendment to the Committee on Commerce to see if we can not pass some law to stop these practices. That is all there is in it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see precisely why it is necessary for the Senator from Kentucky to provide for this information running back to a period as far as 1868. It seems to me that will require the examination of a great many accounts of consuls and a very large correspondence that would be utterly ineffectual for the purpose which the Senator has in view. I am in entire sympathy with him.

Mr. BECK. Let it run back to 1878, then. I do not care. If the practice has been existing and still exists, if it has become a long-continued and chronic one, I desire that to be shown; but perhaps 1878 will do as well as 1868. I do not care.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that this information may be had in a general way without requiring it in detail. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report calls attention to the fact that in this indirect manner many consuls have added, or at least he supposes they have added, to their compensation.

Mr. INGALLS. Improperly?

Mr. ALLISON. Well, that is the inference in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Certain consuls at certain ports, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, have been in the habit of having notaries outside of their offices, or at least not connected with their offices, to make the necessary certification and charge a fee for it. The implication of the resolution is that the consular officers have divided the fees with those notaries. It seems to me it will be exceedingly difficult for any officer, either the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury, to inquire of foreign notaries and get an accurate statement of the amount of fees they have divided with our consuls. So I think the inquiry will be rather a difficult one and hardly necessary for the purpose indicated.

I am perfectly willing myself that the proper committee, the Committee on Commerce or whatever committee has charge of this subject, should report the bill suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, that the sum of $2.50, if that be the sum, shall constitute the entire fee. I do not think it is very important that the notaries in foreign countries should be required to take the affidavit of manufacturers; I doubt whether it is very important in any view to take their evidence; but if the Senator from Kentucky is anxious to have this inquiry made, I do not know that I shall interpose any objection.

Mr. BECK. The bill I introduced yesterday reaches that branch of it, and I only desire, as it is a very bad practice, to have it broken up. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report does suggest—he does not argue elaborately—that the condition of things I seek to prevent is now going on and has been for years. If it is, or has been, we ought to find some way to stop it. I am not seeking to expose any particular persons. I have no information to the effect that any particular man is guilty; I do not propose to intimate that I have; if any one has done so in times gone by I do not specially desire to prove that he has been guilty of anything wrong. I only desire that the practice shall be stopped.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky modify his resolution?

Mr. BECK. Make the date 1878 instead of 1868, or any other reasonable year. I do not care.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky, assuming that notarial and consular and commercial fees have been paid as is implied in the resolution, whether there is any violation of a statute or existing regulation on the subject in their so doing?

Mr. BECK. I think it is a violation of our existing regulations for our commercial agents or consuls to go into partnership in fees or anything else with the consuls or commercial agents of foreign nations, and they ought not to be allowed to do indirectly what they can not themselves do by law. I think these things have been done; perhaps they are being done now. If so, we ought to endeavor to stop the practice.

Mr. INGALLS. If this is to be an inquisition for partisan purposes, directed to the action of officials appointed under previous Administrations, it requires some examination before it is adopted by the Senate, and I will therefore move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which I believe would be the appropriate committee for its consideration and report.

Mr. BECK. I have only this to say: I have no partisan purpose in offering the resolution and desiring to obtain the information. If the Senator from Kansas or anybody else thinks that any one appointed under a previous Administration is liable to be affected by it and that he can send it to a partisan committee to keep us from obtaining the information, I shall call for the yeas and nays on the motion of reference and see whether that information is to be thus withheld.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not assume that this was intended for any partisan purpose, for it relates to a subject concerning which I am absolutely without information; and therefore, for the purpose of enabling myself to vote intelligently, I asked the Senator from Kentucky whether it was his understanding, admitting the assumptions in the resolution to be true, that there had been any acts committed in violation of existing statute or existing regulations of law. He said that he supposed there were such alleged violations; and he wishes to go back over a period of nearly a quarter of a century to ascertain if possible what has been done by Republican officials in violation of law. If the Senator from Kentucky desires to make his inquiry for the purpose of relieving commerce from certain burdens which ought not to be imposed upon it, that is one thing, and that could be accomplished by a different procedure from the one which is contemplated by the resolution.

I, therefore, sir, repel any insinuation made by the Senator from Kentucky that the resolution is to be referred to a partisan committee for the purpose of inculpating or exculpating anybody. It is the proper course to be taken after the averments which have been made by the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate under and by what authority a so-called State Legislature has been organized in the Territory of Dakota, if such a body has been organized as alleged, and by what warrant or authority said organization has proceeded to elect Senators to this body. And that said committee inquire further and report whether said organization is not calculated to bring about a conflict of authority prejudicial to the good order of said Territory and demoralizing to the present Territorial government legally organized and administered under the authority of the National Government; and that said committee have leave to report any special matter relating to the affairs of said Territory requiring or demanding the attention of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana objects.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not object.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table and be printed under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs pardon. The Senator from Kansas asks that the resolution lie on the table and be printed under the rule. That order will be made.

DISALLOWED ACCOUNTS AND VOUCHERS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of claims, accounts, and vouchers against the Government, paid by disbursing officers or otherwise, which have been, since the 1st of January last, disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, together with a memorandum in each case showing the reasons for disallowance; and what further action, if any, has been taken thereupon; and also copies of all written opinions and decisions which have been rendered by any officer in such cases and of any explanations made by officials making or authorizing such payments.

SEVENTH NEW YORK CAVALRY.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all official orders and correspondence relative to the recruiting, enlistment, organization, history, and discharge of the Seventh Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, commonly called the Second Black Horse Cavalry; also, to state whether any bounty has been paid to the enlisted men of said regiment, and, if not, upon what grounds such bounty has been denied.

PRINTING OF SENATE RULES.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That there be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the Senate 500 copies of the standing rules of the Senate, together with the rules for the regulation of the Senate wing of the Capitol building.

That is simply this pamphlet [exhibiting] and the edition is completely exhausted. The calls are very frequent indeed. The cost of it would be less than $500, the matter being all in type now. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator would enlarge the number. I have frequent applications, not for the Manual, but for the rules of order and regulations concerning the parliamentary proceedings of the Senate, from persons outside, and I think the number could be profitably doubled, if it would not go outside of the limit which is prescribed by the regulations for printing without a reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FRYE. I think if the number was made over 600 it would be obliged to be sent to the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. Make it 600.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to making it 600. I think that would come entirely under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 118) for the relief of Alexander R. Lawton, of the State of Georgia.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NORTHERN CHEYENNE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of 10th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon the subject of the condition of the Northern Cheyenne Indians upon the Rosebud and Tongue Rivers, in Montana, the inadequacy of the appropriation made for their support during the current fiscal year, and requesting legislative authority for the use of certain funds indicated, for their relief.

The proposed legislation does not involve any additional appropriation, and the necessity for the authority requested is urgent. I therefore recommend the matter to the early and favorable consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 14, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the reference of this message of the President. In the absence of any motion it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The message was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to a discrepancy between the law and the rules of the Senate in respect to the appointment of the Committee on Printing, and will ask the Secretary to read the section of the Revised Statutes upon the subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3756. There shall be a joint committee on public printing, consisting of three members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, who shall have the powers hereinafter stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will also read the rule of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXIV.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

In the appointment of the standing committees the Senate, unless otherwise ordered, shall proceed by ballot to appoint severally the chairman of each committee, and then, by one ballot, the other members necessary to complete the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that under the rule the Committee on Printing would be legally organized, and that under the express power granted by the Constitution the Senate should have a right to prescribe the mode of organizing its committees; but to avoid a doubt that might arise as to the validity of contracts made under existing law the Chair will appoint the committee under the provisions of law, following the example set by his predecessor in the last Congress. The Chair appoints as members of the committee the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], the same members appointed by the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not interpose an objection if the Chair is following the precedent of the last Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is following the precedent adopted by his predecessor.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that I think it is very clear no statute can in the least limit or qualify the constitutional power of this body to determine by its rules in what mode its committees and other officers shall be appointed, and that I would be sorry to have the Senate recognize that question as a doubtful one by taking any steps upon any other theory than that of the absolute authority of the Senate over the question; but as the Chair has made that point and I have entered this protest on my own part I shall let it pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same question was presented to the person who occupied the chair at the last Congress, and he thought it wise and safe to adopt the course that the present President of the Senate has done. Agreeing entirely with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said as to the inherent, the inalienable constitutional power of each House of Congress to do its own business in its own way by its own committees of its own appointment, and that no statute of the United States can interfere with that power in the least degree, it still occurred to the President of the Senate in the last Congress, as doubtless it has to the President of the Senate at this session, that it might be competent for Congress in regulating the public printing to say that no money should be paid from the Treasury except under contracts made by the authority and consent of a certain board of persons appointed in a particular way. Therefore, the fear of your predecessor was that there might be a trouble about the accounts for printing passed by a committee not named in the statute, the statutory committee being the one whose certificate was necessary to pass the accounts at the Treasury. That is one thing, and it is open to considerable fair argument, I think, in support of the idea that Congress has the power, in regulating the expenditure of public money and in carrying on the public business, to say that that shall be done under such and such supervision or it shall not be done at all.

While, therefore, the Senate would have a right to have a dozen committees on printing if it wanted them in spite of any statute that said it should not, when it came to the test as to what was the authority for expending certain public money, if the law had said that the authority must be six persons named by the President of the United States, if you please, or by the presiding officers of the two Houses, or whoever, it might be a different question. Owing to that difficulty your predecessor thought it fit to do what I think you have rightfully done to guard against any difficulty.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order, and the first bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 471) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no amendment offered the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, in the fall of 1881 my attention was very forcibly called to the subject under discussion owing to the assassination of President Garfield, which found the country without a President of the Senate or a Speaker of the House of Representatives. I had not believed that the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House was such an officer as the Constitution contemplated. While at home during the vacation I made a very thorough investigation of the question and became fully satisfied that neither the President pro tempore of the Senate nor the Speaker of the House was eligible under the Constitution to act as provisional successor. Reaching here, I had the honor of introducing the following resolution on the second day of the session, December 6, 1881:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to carry into effect the provision of the Constitution in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, as well as the provision in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President; and said committee will report by bill or otherwise.

It will be observed that the only substantial difference between this resolution and that offered the same day by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is that mine leaves off the preamble, which I considered unnecessary. Both, however, have the same end in view.

Both resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The verbiage of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky was exactly that of the resolution which passed the Senate on the 26th of June, 1856, and which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and a very able report from that committee was presented to the Senate through Mr. Butler, of South Carolina. That committee drew certain conclusions as to the law as it now stands, being the act of 1792, conferring the office, upon the death, resignation, removal, or inability of both President and Vice-President, first upon the President of the Senate, and second upon the Speaker of the House, and contrasted it with the proposition to devolve the office on the Chief-Justice, and also with the proposition to devolve it on the Secretary of State. Able as the report undoubtedly is, I am unable to agree with its reasoning or conclusions.

The subject of devolving the office upon the Cabinet was discussed by them, and the objection so happily covered by the pending bill was presented in that report, namely, that there might be a Cabinet officer who did not possess the constitutional qualifications for President, that is to say, he might be under the age of thirty-five years, or he might not be a native citizen of the United States. That was discussed. In fact there has been one Cabinet officer (Mr. Schurz), not a native of the United States, since I have been in the Senate. Their conclusion was that the office might properly, in the case mentioned, go to the Chief-Justice. I differ widely.

The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky and that of myself, to which I refer, were presented, as I have stated, on the 6th of December, 1881. On the 8th of December, two days thereafter, Mr. Garland, of Arkansas, introduced a bill to remedy the existing evil. The theory of the bill of the then Senator from Arkansas was precisely that of the bill under consideration, but devolved the office, in the contingency of the death, resignation, removal, or inability of both President and Vice-President, first upon the Secretary of State and next upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe the bill stopped at that point, as that distinguished Senator and able lawyer evidently thought that ample provision was made by the designation of the two chief officers of the Cabinet.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will state that the substance of the pending bill was stated to the House of Representatives, I believe in the Congress between 1873 and 1875, in a speech there by a Representative from Massachusetts who is a near relative of mine and was formerly Attorney-General in Mr. Grant's Cabinet. That I may not appear to shine in borrowed plumes at all, I will state that the idea of this measure I got from that speech of my brother.

Mr. MAXEY. I surely do not endeavor to cast reflection upon anybody, but my purpose is simply to give a true history of what occurred in the Senate. I was not aware of what had occurred in the other House, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The first bill offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was during the Forty-seventh Congress, first session, and was reported June 19, 1882. He offered a like bill (that Congress having failed to enact a law) on December 4, 1883, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, and at the present Congress, on the 8th of this month, the same bill with some slight amendments not of importance.

So far as I have investigated, no steps had been taken in the Senate on this all-important subject since the passage of the Crittenden resolution, before referred to, in June, 1856, until the introduction of the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky and myself on the 6th of December, 1881, suggesting no plan, but seeking a plan from the Committee on the Judiciary, followed promptly, as I have stated, on the 8th of December, 1881, by the bill of Mr. Garland, framed on the same theory as that now under consideration.

Now, I desire to state that the investigation I made of this subject satisfied me that the clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that in the event I have mentioned the Congress shall designate by law the officer who shall discharge the duties of President until an election can be had means an officer of the United States. That the President of the Senate is not an officer of the United States was distinctly settled in the Blount case, and for the same reason the Speaker of the House is not an officer of the United States. Therefore the designation of these officers is not a compliance with that provision of the Constitution. Senator Blount was impeached by the House of Representatives. The case came to the Senate, I believe in the year 1797—at all events in one of the last years of the last century—and a plea to the jurisdiction was filed by him here, in which he said in substance that the clause that the President and Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States shall be liable to impeachment did not apply to him, because he was not the President, the Vice-President, or a civil officer of the United States; that he held his commission from the State of Tennessee and not from the United States, and in no sense was an officer of the United States. That plea to the jurisdiction was sustained, and the articles of impeachment went out. That was a conclusive settlement of the question that a Senator is not an officer of the United States, and for a like reason the Speaker of the House is not an officer of the United States, but an officer commissioned by the governor of his State, holding his election from a district of his State. That was the view I had on that subject, and it is proper to observe that the decision in the Blount case nearly ninety years ago has never been overturned; and it is also entirely plain from the Constitution itself, which prohibits an officer of the United States from being a member of either House.

Now, in reference to the designation of the Chief-Justice, as well as President pro tempore of the Senate, as indicated by the report of the Judiciary Committee in 1856, I call attention to Mr. Madison's view in the debate in the First Congress of the United States, as shown in the Annals of Congress, page 855; and if there is any higher authority than Mr. Madison on a question like this I do not know it:

Mr. Madison objected to the Chief-Justice, as it would be blending the judiciary and the executive. He objected to the President pro tempore of the Senate. He will be a Senator of some particular State, liable to be instructed by the State, and will still hold his office; thus he will hold two offices at once.

Mr. Smith states a variety of objections to Mr. Livermore's proposition. He thought it unconstitutional, as it would, in its operation, deprive a State of a vote in the Senate.

The presentation of these suggestions of Mr. Madison and Mr. Smith came about because the House of Representatives, in the bill which ultimately became the law of 1792, favored the designation of the Secretary of State as the officer to succeed in the event of the death, &c., of both the President and Vice-President. The Senate was in favor of the President pro tempore of the Senate and Speaker of the House. It is historically known that at that time the House was in favor of and in sympathy with the policy of Mr. Jefferson, who was then Secretary of State. It is also true that the Senate was not in sympathy with the politics of Mr. Jefferson, and refused to accept the designation of the Secretary of State, and insisted on the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and the matter was finally settled in conference, and the law passed as we have it.

It has been said on the floor of the Senate that we should pay great deference to the law of 1792 as it stands, because it has been on the statute-book for more than ninety years and was sanctified by time. Mr. President, there has never been an occasion in the history of this country, happily, where there was any need to call into exercise that act of Congress, and while we have had four Presidents to die in office (President Harrison, President Taylor, President Lincoln, and President Garfield), and while we have had five Vice-Presidents die in office (Vice-Presidents Clinton of New York, Gerry of Massachusetts, King of Alabama, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Hendricks of Indiana), and in addition to these five deaths we have had one vacancy occasioned by resignation, that of Mr. Calhoun, who resigned as Vice-President during the first Adminstration of General Jackson, yet it has most fortunately and happily for the country happened that the President and Vice-President did not both die during one Presidential term. Therefore there has been no occasion for calling into exercise the act of 1792.

But as to the sanctity of that act, it vanishes in the light of history. It is of record from the pen of Alexander Hamilton himself, in his letter to Colonel Carrington, which I placed on record in January, 1883, that he was one of the men who prevented the Secretary of State (then Mr. Jefferson) being named as the provisional successor, and for the assigned reason that Mr. Jefferson had thrown his influence against him on every occasion, and this was a fair opportunity to practice the doctrine of lex talionis. Those were not his words, but that was the substance.

In a letter which was addressed by Mr. Madison to Edmund Pendleton, then governor of Virginia, dated February 21, 1792, pending the bill which became the act of 1792, Mr. Madison, then being a member of Congress, wrote as follows:

The bill concerning the election of a President and Vice-President, and the eventual successor to both, which has long been depending, has finally got through the two Houses. It was made a question whether the number of electors ought to correspond with the new apportionment or the existing House of Representatives. The text of the Constitution was not decisive, and the Northern interest was strongly in favor of the latter interpretation. The intrinsic rectitude, however, of the former turned the decision in both Houses in favor of the Southern. On another point the bill certainly errs. It provides that in case of a double vacancy the executive powers shall devolve on the President pro tempore of the Senate, and he failing, on the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The objections to this arrangement are various:

1. It may be questioned whether these are officers in the constitutional sense.
2. If officers, whether both could be introduced.
3. As they are created by the Constitution, they would probably have been there designated if contemplated for such a service, instead of being left to the legislative selection.
4. Either they will retain their legislative stations, and then incompatible functions will be blended; or the incompatibility will supersede those stations, and then, those being the substratum of the adventitious functions, these must fail also. The Constitution says, Congress must declare what officers, &c., which seems to make it not an appointment or a translation, but an annexation of one office or trust to another office. The House of Representatives proposed to substitute the Secretary of State, but the Senate disagreed, and there being much delicacy in the matter it was not pressed by the former.—Writings of James Madison, volume 1, 1769 to 1793, pages 548 and 549.

The letter to which I referred, of Alexander Hamilton to Colonel Carrington, which is dated on the 26th of May, 1792, may be found in Hamilton's History of the Republic of the United States, volume 4, page 536. He there said:

You know how much it was a point to establish the Secretary of State as the officer who was to administer the Government in defect of the President and Vice-President. Here I acknowledge, though I took far less part than was supposed, I ran counter to Mr. Jefferson's wishes; but if I had had no other reason for it, I had already experienced opposition from him, which rendered it a measure of self-defense.

The letter of Fisher Ames, in which he gave the same account of it as Hamilton, and in which he stated that the Senate had stricken out the Secretary of State because they were determined that he should not be "king of the Romans," is found in Mr. Ames's works, volume 1, pages 113, 114, as follows:

The Secretary of State is struck out of the bill for the future Presidency, in case of the two first offices becoming vacant. His friends seemed to think it important to hold him up as king of the Romans. The firmness of the Senate kept him out.

In "The Life and Times of Madison" the same letter of Alexander Hamilton is referred to, and what was said about it may be found on page 223, as follows:

That this decision proceeded mainly, if not exclusively, from feelings of personal and political enmity to the gentleman who then filled the office of Secretary of State, and the jealousy entertained of him by the friends and partisans of the Secretary of the Treasury, is rendered apparent by the surviving memorials of the time. Colonel Hamilton himself, in a letter to a friend of his, of nearly contemporaneous date with the transaction, acknowledged that he used his influence, from motives of personal and political opposition to Mr. Jefferson, to defeat the amendment of the House.

All these historical facts go to show that the act of 1792 was not the deliberate judgment of Congress looking alone to what was best, but that there was a fierce war going on between Alexander Hamilton, the leader of the Federal party, then Secretary of the Treasury, and Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State, and that this act was the result of the controversy. Hence with me it has no sanctity whatever.

I therefore look upon the question as presented fairly and squarely by the bill under consideration. Shall the provisional successor be taken from the line of the Cabinet or shall he be the President pro tempore of the Senate, and, if none, the Speaker of the House? The inefficiency of the present law we have found twice within a little over four years. When President Garfield was assassinated there was no President pro tempore of the Senate; there was no Speaker of the House; and when Mr. Hendricks died a few days ago there was no President pro tempore of the Senate, there was no Speaker of the House. As I have stated, there have been four occasions of death of President and five of Vice-President and one vacancy by resignation. It has happened—that is the proper word—that the death of both President and Vice-President did not occur in the same Administration, but that was a mere fortuitous circumstance. Suppose that the President and Vice-President in the cases mentioned had both died during the same Administration, and without, as in the last two cases, any President pro tempore of the Senate or Speaker of the House, the country would have been without anybody entitled by law to take the position of President.

While I do not believe that anarchy would have ensued, yet it is infinitely better never to put any strain unwarranted by the Constitution or law upon the institutions of our country.

It has been said that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House should be selected because they come from the people; that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, and so on, should not be because they do not. The President of the Senate does not come by election from the people of the United States. I have shown that he is not an officer of the United States. He comes from his State and holds his commission from his State, and the influences, whatever they may be, brought to bear upon the action of a Senator in this body are brought by the people of his State. The Speaker of the House is not an officer of the United States, does not come from the United States by election of the people of the United States, but from the election of one of the districts in his State. The Secretary of State is an officer of the United States beyond all possible question. He is appointed by authority of the Constitution of the United States; he holds his commission by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and he is selected by the President, whatever may be the policy of the President, because he is in accord with the policy which the President proposes to pursue in his Administration. So that whether the President be a Republican or a Democrat, whatever he may be, it is carrying out the will of the people as nearly as it is possible for us to do should the unfortunate occurrence come about that we have no President or Vice-President when we place in his stead a man whose politics are in accord with those of the people as indicated by their election of President and Vice-President. Therefore, in my judgment, not only because these are officers of the United States, but because they are the proper officers, I believe that the provisional successor should come from that line.

It has been suggested in the report of 1856 referred to that the Chief-Justice should be the provisional successor. Mr. President, the greatest calamity that ever befell the Supreme Court, in my judgment, was when a portion of its members were taken out of their proper functions as judges and placed upon the Electoral Commission. More stain was brought upon this high court by that among the American people than ever was brought by all other causes put together. Not that I say or intimate that the judgment of those five men was unconscientious, but it so happened that their judgment was in strict accord with their party affiliations. I want to keep that court absolutely unspotted and pure from any connection with the political or executive department of this Government, and to confine them exclusively to the judicial department.

As I mentioned a moment ago, this bill contains a clause which removes one material objection to the former bill. It makes the provision that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, and so on, shall have the qualifications necessary for President of the United States. That removes a serious objection; and while the line may be unnecessarily long, going through the entire list of the Cabinet, still that does no harm. It makes it next to impossible that the wheels of this Government can constitutionally stop for one instant; so that, although the President and the Vice-President may both die, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and so on, still the wheels of Government shall be kept in motion so long as one of the Cabinet survives. The bill, in my judgment, is wise and proper, and provides, as far as human foresight can provide, against any probable contingency.

But one question further do I care to discuss, and that is only for a moment. Shall the provisional successor, whoever he may be, hold until the next quadrennial election? I admit that the question is one of great doubt and difficulty. I have examined that point in all the lights that I can. The Constitution simply says that Congress shall designate the officer who shall hold until the disability is removed or an election shall be had. That is all the light we get from the Constitution. It does not say when the election shall be had. But while there is great doubt in the minds of many enlightened lawyers and statesmen in regard to the matter, the solution of that doubt by Congress will be accepted by all as a final settlement of the question. The weight of authority, in my judgment, leads to the conclusion that it was the design and intent of the framers of our Constitution that we should have only quadrennial elections, and so I believe; that the elections should take place every four years; and if it was designed by the Constitution, as provided by the act of 1792, that this provisional successor should hold until such election can be had as is named in that act, it would break the entire line of our Presidential succession; it would change the organization of every branch of the Government at unexpected times; everything would be turned topsy-turvy. I do not think that was designed or intended.

It has been suggested in the report of 1856 before referred to that the Cabinet officers might not be proper, because it might be argued that their commissions expire with the term of the President appointing them. I can not think so. A Cabinet officer is commissioned and his commission holds until his successor is duly qualified, and he remains an officer of the United States until thus superseded precisely like all others thus appointed. And on that point I am glad to say that my distinguished friend, a great lawyer, the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], coincides with that view, as I notice that he nods assent to the position. So you have absolutely and conclusively a provision to meet public expectation by curing a defect, and, in my judgment, a wise provision, and in the right line, in the line of the political departments of the Government as intrusted to the Executive by the people.

Mr. President, I have heretofore elaborated many of the propositions which I have briefly suggested to-day in the remarks I made on the 14th of December, 1881, and on the 5th of January, 1883, reported in the RECORD of the next day in each case. I have only on this occasion deemed it proper to state historically the course of this bill so far as it has come under my observation since I have been a member of the Senate and so far as the records of the Senate show, including the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in August, 1856, by Mr. Butler, and to summarize briefly the leading points material to be discussed.

In my judgment we will signally fail to meet the just expectations of the people in providing against a great evil which, as the law stands, may befall our country at any time when Congress is not in session.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech on this bill, but as the Senator from Texas has alluded to the fact that at an early day in December, 1881—I believe on the second day of the session—I introduced a resolution looking to a thorough investigation of this question—I desire now only to say that, having preserved a number of copies of the debate at that time, including the speeches of myself, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Anthony], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Garland], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES], which were bound together in one pamphlet, I have caused copies of them to be laid on the desk of every Senator this morning, so that each can look at them for himself.

I wish also to add that the most valuable part of the contribution to that debate, so far as I was concerned, consisted of a very elaborate and able paper furnished me by the very accomplished Reporter of the Senate [Mr. Murphy], which contains the whole history of the difficulties attending the Presidential succession law as it now stands—a paper prepared with absolute impartiality and with great ability. As this bill will go to the House of Representatives, if we pass it, and as many of the gentlemen who have to consider it there may not have access to Mr. Murphy's paper, I should be very glad if the Senate would allow me to have it published in the RECORD as part of my remarks. I do not care to take time to read it. If there is no objection I will consider that leave as granted.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator state what that paper is? There is no objection, of course; but we did not hear his statement of the paper.

Mr. BECK. The paper prepared by Mr. Murphy in reply to a note addressed by me to him on the 6th of July, 1881, four days after President Garfield was shot, in which he reviewed the whole matter now under consideration very carefully and very elaborately. I think it will be well to publish it in the RECORD, so that gentlemen of the other House may have a chance to look at it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BECK. I will therefore hand the correspondence to the Reporter for publication in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be so published.

The correspondence is as follows:

LETTER OF SENATOR BECK.

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, July 6, 1881.

DEAR SIR: The attempted assassination of the President will require a careful examination by Congress of the constitutional and legal provisions relative to vacancies in that high office. I submitted to you on yesterday the remarks of Mr. Crittenden in 1856, with a few suggestions of my own, before mailing them to the Louisville Courier-Journal. Knowing how thoroughly you understand and how keenly you appreciate the importance of this question, I hope you will give me your views in regard to the subject at your earliest convenience, and oblige,

Yours, truly,

J. B. BECK.

D. F. MURPHY, Esq.

REPLY OF MR. MURPHY.

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Your note of the 6th instant was duly received, and I proceed to reply as soon as a reference to the authorities of which I spoke to you in our conversation has enabled me to verify my recollection of the historic facts which I verbally stated to you.

The only constitutional provision on the subject to which my attention is invited is found in Article II, section 1, clause 5. That clause provides for the devolution of the powers and duties of the President upon the Vice-President in the event of the removal from office, death, resignation, or inability of the President, and proceeds to declare:

"And the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected."

The history of the insertion of this clause may be briefly stated:

The Federal Convention, after discussion, gave expression to its views of the principles on which the new government of the Union should be formed by a series of resolutions, which on the 26th of July, 1787, were referred to a committee of detail to formulate in the form of a draught of a constitution. The committee of detail reported a draught on the 6th of August, 1787. This report provided for the executive power being vested in a President and for his removal by impeachment, and then proceeded to declare:

"In case of his removal, as aforesaid, death, resignation, or disability to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the President of the Senate shall exercise those powers and duties until another President of the United States be chosen, or until the disability of the President be removed."

When this report was made no provision had been made for a Vice-President, nor does a proposition for such an officer appear to have been broached. When this clause came up for consideration, on the 27th of August, Mr. Madison records the proceedings as follows:

"The clause for removing the President on impeachment by the House of Representatives and conviction in the Supreme Court of treason, bribery, or corruption, was postponed, nem. con., at the instance of Mr. Gouverneur Morris, who thought the tribunal an improper one, particularly if the first judge was to be of the privy council.

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris objected also to the President of the Senate being provisional successor to the President, and suggested a designation of the Chief-Justice.

"Mr. Madison adds, as a ground of objection, that the Senate might retard the appointment of a President, in order to carry points while the revisionary power was in the president of their own body; but suggested that the executive powers during a vacancy be administered by the persons composing the council to the President.

"Mr. Williamson suggested that the Legislature ought to have power to provide for occasional successors, and moved that the last clause of Article X, section 2, relating to a provisional successor to the President, be postponed.

"Mr. Dickinson seconded the postponement, remarking that it was too vague. What is the extent of the term 'disability,' and who is to be the judge of it?

"The postponement was agreed to, nem. con."—The Madison Papers, volume 5 of Elliott's Debates, pages 480 and 481.

Several other clauses of the article relative to the Executive were postponed, and finally the postponed clauses were on the 31st of August referred to a committee of eleven. This committee, on the 4th of September, made a report, in which the Vice-President first appeared, and it also provided for his assuming the powers and duties of the President in the event of his removal, death, absence, resignation or inability, but made no provision for the event of a vacancy in both offices. After this report was agreed to the omission just referred to was supplied on the 7th of September upon the motion of Mr. Randolph. The proceedings on that point are thus recorded by Mr. Madison:

"Mr. Randolph moved to insert in the first section of the report made yesterday the following:

"'The Legislature may declare by law what officer of the United States shall act as President in case of the death, resignation, or disability of the President and Vice-President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the time of electing a President shall arrive.'

"Mr. Madison observed that this, as worded, would prevent a supply of the vacancy by an intermediate election of the President, and moved to substitute 'until such disability be removed or a President shall be elected.'

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris seconded the motion; which was agreed to.

"It seemed to be an objection to the provision, with some, that, according to the process established for choosing the Executive, there would be difficulty in effecting it at other than the fixed periods; with others, that the Legislature was restrained in the temporary appointment to 'officers' of the United States. They wished it to be at liberty to appoint others than such.

"On the motion of Mr. Randolph, as amended, it passed in the affirmative."—The Madison Papers, volume 5 of Elliott's Debates, pages 520 and 521.

This amendment, after undergoing the scrutiny of the committee on revision and style, is substantially the provision already quoted as contained in the Constitution.

In the First Congress an attempt was made in the House of Representatives to execute the power thus conferred. On the 20th of December, 1790, "Mr. Benson, from the committee appointed for the purpose, presented a bill declaring the officer who, in case of vacancies both of the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States, shall act as President," and the bill came up for discussion on the 10th of January, 1791. The committee's bill as reported left a blank for the name of the officer to be designated. A motion was made to fill the blank with "the Secretary of State." Suggestions were made for filling it with "the Secretary of the Treasury," with "the Chief-Justice," with "the President pro tempore of the Senate," and with "the Speaker of the House;" but, after considerable discussion, no conclusion was reached, and an adjournment was had without any result. The debate was resumed on the 13th of January, when the same contrariety of opinion was manifested, and finally, several members suggesting that there was no necessity for immediate action, the subject was postponed and was not resumed during that Congress.

When the Second Congress met, October 24, 1791, it was important to make early provision relative to the choice of electors who were to make the second election of President during the ensuing year, and early in the session the Senate appointed a committee "to report a bill determining the time of choosing the electors of President and Vice-President and the day on which they shall give their votes, and prescribing the mode of transmitting the votes to the seat of Government." This committee reported a bill on the 15th of November, and on the 23d of that month the bill, being under consideration, was recommitted, and the committee "instructed to report a clause making provision for the administration of government in case of vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President." The bill was reported again on the 28th of November with amendments, which were agreed to, and the bill ordered to a third reading. On the 30th of November it was read the third time and passed, with the ninth and tenth sections substantially as they now appear in the act of March 1, 1792. As at that time the Senate sat with closed doors, there is no record of the reasons which induced it to provide in the ninth section of this bill for the President of the Senate pro tempore, or, in case there should be none, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, acting as President in the event of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President of the United States, nor is there any record of the reasons why this subject should have been joined in the same bill with the provisions relative to the choice of electors and the mode of casting and counting their votes.

The bill was received by the House of Representatives on the 30th of November, 1791, was read the first time on the 1st of December, and on the 21st of December the House in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider it. A motion was made to strike out the ninth section upon the ground that it was not germane to the main purpose of the bill. This motion being negatived, it was then moved to strike out the words "the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there should be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being," and the question of the competency of these officials for the position was discussed; but the account of the discussion in the Annals of Congress is quite meager and unsatisfactory. On the 2d of January, 1792, the Committee of the Whole voted upon the question, and the motion to strike out was negatived. Amendments having been made to the prior clauses of the bill, it was reported to the House, and the motion to strike out the ninth section being renewed, the question was divided. On the motion to strike out "the President of the Senate pro tempore" the vote was yeas 24, nays 27. Among the yeas were three members who had been delegates to the constitutional convention, viz: Messrs. Baldwin, Fitzsimons, and Madison, while in the negative was the name of but one member who had served in the constitutional convention, Mr. Gilman. Then the question being put on striking out the words "and in case there should be no President of the Senate then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being" the vote was yeas 26, nays 25. The record adds: "The bill was then laid on the table." It is evident that these votes had placed the bill in a very unsatisfactory condition. It was taken from the table on the 6th of January and recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House. Its consideration was resumed on the 9th of February, when the ninth section was stricken out, and on the following day the blank thus made in the bill was filled by a provision in these words:

"And be it further enacted, That in case of removal, death, resignation or inability, both of the President and Vice-President of the United States, the Secretary of State, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected."

When the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole the amendment striking out the ninth section of the Senate bill was concurred in by a vote of 32 yeas to 22 nays, and in the affirmative are recorded the names of four members who had been in the constitutional convention, while in the negative is not the name of a single member who had served in that body. The amendment substituting for this section the provision designating "the Secretary of State" was then agreed to without a division. On the 14th of February the bill was further considered, but no allusion seems then to have been made to this portion of it, and on the 15th of February it was passed by the House with amendments.

On the return of the bill to the Senate the amendments of the House were all agreed to on the 20th of February, 1792, with the exception of that to the ninth section, designating who should act as President in the event of a vacancy in the offices of both President and Vice-President, and to this amendment the Senate disagreed.

The difference between the two Houses was thus narrowed down to this single question, and the bill being returned to the House of Representatives, a motion was made on the 21st of February that the House recede from its amendment, and this motion was agreed to by a vote of yeas 31, nays 24. Among those who voted for receding were two members who had been in the constitutional convention, the name of one of whom, Mr. Dayton, does not appear in the previous votes on this question, the other being Mr. Fitzsimons, who had previously voted with Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Gilman, and Mr. Madison, which latter three still adhered to their position.

The report of the debates on this bill is so brief and unsatisfactory as to leave much room for surmise as to the motives which actuated members. A reference, however, to the current history of that day proves that many men were actuated more by their feelings in regard to the particular persons occupying the stations whose occupants were named to fill a possible vacancy in the Presidency than by the mere consideration of the stations themselves. Perhaps this is well illustrated by a few extracts from the writings of one of the most prominent leaders of the Federal party at that day in Congress. Soon after the debate in the First Congress, above referred to, Mr. Ames, in a letter to Thomas Dwight, under date of January 24, 1791, having spoken of various measures pending in Congress, proceeded to say:

"On a late debate on the bill to provide what officer shall act as President when the two first offices shall be vacant the ambition of Mr. Jefferson's friends was disclosed. They contended for him with zeal. That will have its share in the business of the session. All this is inter nos."—Life and Works of Fisher Ames, Little, Brown & Co.'s edition of 1854, volume 1, page 93.

And again, after the bill pending in the Second Congress had been disposed of by the two Houses, in a letter to Thomas Dwight, dated February 23, 1792, Mr. Ames said:

"The Secretary of State is struck out of the bill for the future Presidency in case of the two first offices becoming vacant. His friends seemed to think it important to hold him up as king of the Romans. The firmness of the Senate kept him out."—Ibid., page 114.

The bill, having been agreed to by both Houses, became a law by the signature of President Washington on the 1st day of March, 1792, and has since remained on the statute-book entirely unaltered, except temporarily in 1877, as to some of the electoral provisions, but in the respect now under consideration it has never been changed in any particular. Its provisions are now embodied in Title III of the Revised Statutes, and the particular sections of that title which embrace the ninth and tenth sections of the act of March 1, 1792, are sections 146, 147, 148, and 149. Section 146 provides:

"In case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate, or, if there is none, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall act as President until the disability is removed or a President elected."

Here, in passing, I must notice the fact that the revisers of the statutes, in embodying the act of 1792 in their revision, designate the presiding officer chosen by the Senate as "the President of the Senate," omitting the words "pro tempore," which are used in the act of 1792, following the Constitution. Brevity in the use of language is commendable in the draughtsman of a statute, but it should never be carried so far as to cause obscurity of meaning. As the Vice-President of the United States is made by the Constitution "President of the Senate," and it is only in his absence or when he exercises the office of President of the United States that the Senate is empowered to choose a President pro tempore for itself, I submit that where the law intends to refer to the latter it should employ the proper constitutional designation. If the object of the revisers was to exclude unnecessary verbiage, it is difficult to see why, having stricken "pro tempore" from the title of the presiding officer chosen by the Senate, they should retain the words "for the time being" after "the Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The first question which suggests itself in the consideration of this enactment is, whether the President of the Senate pro tempore or the Speaker of the House of Representatives is such an officer as, within the contemplation of the Constitution, can be designated to act as President of the United States in the contingency provided for. I do not venture to suggest any doubt of my own in this respect, but merely to bring to your notice the fact that grave doubt may exist upon this point, and on a question of such vital importance to the peace of the country as the succession to the Presidential office it is dangerous even to leave room for doubt. From Mr. Madison's record of the insertion of the clause in the Constitution, it is evident that the convention regarded the word "officer," as there used, as meaning "officer of the United States," and in the debates in the First and Second Congresses, before referred to, it seems to have been almost universally taken for granted that this was the meaning of the clause. Many of eminence and distinction then contended that no member of the Senate or House of Representatives, even though occupying the chair by the choice of either House, was or could be an "officer of the United States" within the meaning of the Constitution. These debates occurred in 1791 and 1792. A few years thereafter, in 1798, the House of Representatives exhibited articles of impeachment against William Blount, who had been a Senator from Tennessee. Mr. Blount presented by demurrer the point that a Senator was not a civil officer of the United States, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, negatived resolutions declaring that a Senator was a civil officer of the United States, and therefore liable to impeachment. This has ever since been considered a decision that a Senator was not a civil officer within the impeaching power of the Constitution, and I presume the same reasoning would apply to a Representative. The language of the Constitution (Article II, section 4) is:

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

If a Senator or Representative is not "a civil officer of the United States" within the impeaching clause of the Constitution, how can he be an "officer of the United States" capable of being designated to perform the functions of acting President of the United States in any contingency?

But suppose no constitutional question could be raised upon this enactment, are there not practical difficulties in the way of its execution if the occasion should ever arise for putting it in force? In the first place, of the two functionaries designated, one, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, ordinarily has no official existence for at least nine months of every alternate year, and the other, the President pro tempore of the Senate, may have no official existence at the same time, so that the law may be practically inoperative. This is the case at the present time, and it was the case during the recess of the Senate from March 17 to October 15, 1877. It was also the case from March to December, 1845. On these three occasions there were recesses of the Senate without a President pro tempore, the Vice-President not having vacated the chair prior to the adjournment to enable one to be elected. I believe these are the only instances of the kind since the passage of the act of 1792.

Prior to the election of Mr. Cobb to the Speakership of the House there had been no Speaker for nearly ten months, and prior to the election of Messrs. Banks and Pennington, respectively, there had been no Speaker for the period of eleven months. As to the President pro tempore of the Senate, his election, when there is a Vice-President, can take place only in one contingency, specifically defined by the Constitution, viz, "in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States;" and the uniform construction has been that when the Vice-President appears again and resumes the chair after such "absence" the President pro tempore is functus officio, and none can exist until the Vice-President again retires and the Senate again elects a President pro tempore.

As I have stated, on the present occasion there is neither President pro tempore of the Senate nor Speaker of the House of Representatives; and in the present division of both Houses he would be a wise man who should venture to predict when such an officer will be chosen by either House.

But there seem to be other practical difficulties in the way of either of these functionaries ever acting as President, if the contingency calling for an acting President should in the course of events arise. It will be noticed that the power of Congress to provide for such a case is a power to designate an officer already existing. He is therefore selected, as the lawyers say, virtute officii. It would seem, therefore, that he must continue to hold the office, the possession of which qualifies him for designation as acting President; otherwise he would lose capacity so to act. The practical effect would be that the President pro tempore of the Senate, if designated as acting President, would still retain his position as Senator and as presiding officer of the Senate, and thus, on the passage of any proposed law, he would have a vote as Senator; when it had passed both Houses he would attest the enrolled bill by his signature as President pro tempore of the Senate, and then this enrolled bill would be submitted to him for his approval or disapproval as acting President of the United States. The same remark would be true if the Speaker of the House of Representatives were called upon to act. Could such a result have been anticipated by the framers of the Constitution, who were so careful to define the lines of demarkation between the legislative and the executive powers and their respective possessors?

The Senate, after much debate, on the 13th of January, 1876, passed a resolution declaring "That the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate;" and thus the President pro tempore of the Senate may be changed daily or hourly, at the pleasure of the body over which he presides. If he should be called upon to perform the duties of acting President of the United States still remaining President pro tempore of the Senate, would not its power to change him continue? Could not the Senate thus secure a daily rotation in the administration of the executive office by changing its President pro tempore every day; thus, perhaps, affording to each of its members an opportunity to be acting President of the United States? Or, if between the deposition of one President pro tempore and the election of another there should be an appreciable instant of time, might not the Speaker of the House of Representatives claim that the time had come for him to exercise the functions of acting President of the United States? Would there not thus be an opportunity for complications and disputes which the peace of the country forbids the incitement of?

Again, the vacancy might happen on the 1st of March, when the Senatorial term of the then President pro tempore might expire on the 3d of that month, as that of the Speaker of the House of Representatives necessarily would. In such a case there would be no provision for the period following the 3d of March.

What would be the term of the officer designated to act as President in the contingency specified? The Constitution answers, "Until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected." In the case of a temporary disability the provision is clear enough; but in case of the removal, death, or resignation of both President and Vice-President the officer designated then to act as President is to so act "until * * * a President shall be elected." These words do not, of themselves, necessarily indicate whether the election of President here referred to is to be at the regular quadrennial period or a special election is to be held; but I am inclined to think, from the change made in the language of the text of the original clause on the motion of Mr. Madison and from his remarks in the Virginia convention (2 Elliott's Debates, page 468), that the purpose was that the election of another President should immediately take place, and this was evidently the view of the framers of the act of 1792. Accordingly, sections 146, 147, and 148 of the Revised Statutes provide for an election of President by the electors on the first Wednesday in December following a vacancy in the offices of President and Vice-President, provided there be the space of two months between the date of notification which the Secretary of State is required to give and the first Wednesday in December.

When the Vice-President succeeds to the Presidential office, his term is expressly defined to be the remainder of the period for which the President was elected. Title III of the Revised Statutes seems to proceed upon the assumption that the regular quadrennial elections of President are to be held notwithstanding an occasion for a special election may intervene. I can find no authority in the Constitution for the election of a President for a less period than four years, and if the occasion for a special election should ever arise, it would, of course, disarrange the machinery of regular quadrennial elections, and this title of the Revised Statutes would need amendment to meet the case.

If such a vacancy should unfortunately arise at the present time, or within two months before the first Wednesday of next December, what would be the practical condition of affairs? An election would be made by the electors in December next, and the President elected would be installed on the 4th of March, next, in the midst of the term of an existing Congress, when no Senatorial or Representative term expires, thus disarranging the symmetry of the machinery of our Government relative to the order and arrangement of legislative and executive terms of office. This is a point which it seems to me requires careful consideration.

I have thus given you the "views" called for in your note of the 6th instant; but I assure you that my purpose has not been to advance any theories or conclusions of my own, rather by some practical considerations to suggest that there is grave necessity for action by Congress upon the question to which you have invited my attention, and it seems to me that I can not more fitly conclude than by using the words which were employed on this very same subject by one of the most illustrious of your own predecessors in the Senate when he said:

"It greatly concerns the peace of the country, and perhaps the very existence of the Government, that the laws enacted by Congress in pursuance of that provision of the Constitution should be so comprehensive as to provide for any vacancy that can possibly occur in the office of President, and so clear as to admit of no controversy nor any question of disputed succession to that high office."

I can not doubt that when the attention of the National Legislature shall be directed to the subject its wisdom and patriotism will soon be able to devise a plan "so comprehensive" and "so clear" as was thus indicated to be desirable by Mr. Crittenden.

I have the honor to be, truly, your friend,

D. F. MURPHY,
Official Reporter United States Senate.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK,
United States Senate.

Mr. BECK. One other word. When that debate was had, having introduced the resolution referred to by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] with a preamble in the same language used by Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, in 1856, when he had a resolution of the same character referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and being impressed with the report made by the committee of the Senate at that time through its distinguished chairman, Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, my mind leaned in the direction of that committee's report; but after a thorough investigation of the subject when it came to be debated here on the 9th day of January, 1883, I expressed my conviction that the present bill, based on the bill of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Garland], which was introduced by him a day or two after my resolution in 1881, was better and safer than the plan proposed in 1856. Therefore I made a speech giving my adhesion to the present bill, which I believe to be the best I could, after investigation, hope to see passed. This bill was passed by the Senate in that Congress by a vote of 40 to 13 and in the last Congress it was passed by the Senate nem. con. I hope it will pass the Senate again.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said yesterday, and it has been repeated to-day by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], that great difficulties might have been experienced by the country if both the President and Vice-President had died or been disqualified for office when this Congress met. We are constantly in the face of dangers under the present law. Suppose that contingency had happened. One died; the other might have died. The Senate when it met two weeks ago found itself here with only 35 Republican Senators able to take their seats; 38 is a quorum necessary to do business. The people of the country had placed the executive authority for four years in the hands of the Democratic party. The Republicans did not propose to respect that decision and did not have a quorum of their own members to transact business and elect a President pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who has not yet arrived, could not aid them. They were powerless to proceed with business of any sort. The question might have been presented at once whether it was the duty of the Democrats in this Chamber to help the Republicans elect a President pro tempore of the Senate, who should on his election exercise all the powers of President of the United States, or whether they should stand still and allow the Republicans to remain in their helpless condition and permit the House of Representatives to do as they did, elect Mr. CARLISLE Speaker by 178 votes, 16 more than a constitutional quorum of that House. If he had been once elected Speaker when there was no President of the Senate, a serious question might have arisen under the present law. He might have asserted his right to act as President even after the Senate had obtained a quorum and elected their President pro tempore and directed him to act as President of the United States. A serious complication might have arisen. I do not know what would have happened. For one, I would not have aided a minority in the Senate who had no quorum to put a Republican in that place in order to assume the position of President when on the same day a Democratic House of Representatives could elect a Democrat; and I doubt whether any gentleman on this side would. That is one of the difficulties which might have confronted us seriously within the last few days. This bill disposes of all that; and whether it is the best thing to be done or not, it is so much better than the present condition that I shall vote for it heartily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I confess I am somewhat surprised at the observations of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] on the question of whether it might or might not have been the duty of the Democratic minority in this Senate to absent themselves and prevent the organization of this body until the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature had been organized and elected a Speaker, and then raised the question whether the President of the Senate, if we ever got one, or the Speaker of the House should be entitled to administer the Government for the forty-five days, or whatever it might be, that the law provides shall intervene before another election of President.

I admit that it is within the capacity of the distinguished and famous party of which my friend is the distinguished leader to resort to revolutionary methods. I admit that it is within the capacity of a large minority of any government to become revolutionists and to attempt to break it up; but I should hope that the day would be a long way off before any Democratic Senator, or Republican Senator if we were in the minority, would resort to any revolutionary method either of action or inaction, presence or absence, with a view to gain the political advantage of dispensing the post-offices and signing the land-warrants during the interval of time between the occurrence of a vacancy in the offices of both President and Vice-President and the time when by the law as it now stands a new President should be elected.

I think all that fear, although it is stated very strongly now by my distinguished friend, is imaginary; I certainly hope it is imaginary; and I should doubt very much, supposing we leave the law to stand as it does now, holding the reins of political power, as the executive office is, in the hands of one or the other of the two political bodies of the country, as the fathers left it until a new election could be had, that it would be fraught with any very great danger to the country. We ought to find some better reason for the passage of this bill than that.

The fact that the Senate of the United States has failed on two or more occasions to do its duty in electing a President pro tempore before it adjourned I agree is lamentable. It ought never to occur again. I doubt if it will occur, whether this law stands or is repealed and the administration of the office is turned over to some other officer or not, for I think it is clear under the Constitution that it is within the power of the Senate, as it is within the power of the legislative bodies of all the States I believe, to elect a President pro tempore or a Speaker pro tempore in view of a constitutional contingency that is to occur or may occur; and it is not necessary that this body should be left disorganized before it can provide by an order and resolution of its own who shall be its presiding officer when the Vice-President is absent from the chair. But I need not spend time in going into that. There ought to have been such a presiding officer. I have no doubt it was in our power when the Vice-President, Mr. Arthur, did not leave the chair, to have elected a President pro tempore to serve when the Vice-President should be absent from the chair. It was equally in our power to have done it last spring, but nobody thought of it in that way.

I am very sorry that we repealed the law which was passed in 1867, requiring the House of Representatives to meet and organize on the 4th day of March, when the term of its members begins, for I believe in a Republic like ours, vast as it is, multiplied as its interests are, that it is fit and right that the representatives of the people of the United States in the strictest sense, the people as people and not through the organization of States, should be in a state of organization during the whole period of their term. I was sorry—and I believe I voted against it, as I certainly ought to have done—when we repealed that provision of law which for some two or three Congresses was in force, providing for the meeting and organization of the House of Representatives on the 4th day of March each alternate year.

If, therefore, I were to regulate this matter (as I know from the present situation and from the opinion of a majority of the Senate I am not to do) or if I were to assist in regulating it, I should leave the substance of the law to stand exactly where it is now, but I should add to it by providing that the House of Representatives should meet and organize on the 4th day of March, when its term begins, so that the country would have four lives between the execution of its executive office and chaos. That would meet everything except a contingency that would not happen once in a hundred thousand years probably before a new election could be had. That is what I would have, and I would have it upon the solid principle, which I believe in, that it was the intention and the necessary scheme of a government of the people that when a vacancy occurred in the office of Chief Magistrate whom the people had elected the representatives of that people, through its States and through its House of Representatives, should be the guardians of that high political office until the voice of the people could be taken again in the selection of a Chief Magistrate elected directly, and that it was not their intention and that it is not in accordance with the true philosophy of republican and democratic government that the President of the United States shall be authorized to name the man who in case of his disability shall be President in his stead, and, as this bill has it, it may be for three years eleven months and twenty-nine days.

It approaches in its nature to the exertion of a royal prerogative of the king in his will or in some way naming the regent who shall perform the functions of the executive office in a kingdom during the minority of the heir apparent. I do not believe in it. And this bill in this respect of continuing the exertion of the Presidential power in the hands of the Secretary of State, whoever he may be—and of course I am not speaking of persons at all, because I have a very high personal regard and respect for the present Secretary of State—but the continuing in his hands, or by another accident in the hands of some one of six or seven men, the absolute possession of the Executive office by designation of the President and his selection for almost the whole of a term of four years, without any power in the States or the people to change it or to have a new election, is, with great respect to this committee, contrary to my ideas of good and safe republican government.

Whatever may be the inconvenience—and it is an inconvenience—of having a new election changing the period of four years, its beginning and its termination, from the 4th of March of the odd years to the 4th of March, it might be, of an even year. However great that inconvenience may be, it appears to me that it weighs nothing in comparison with the danger of the principle and the danger of the practice of saying that whoever is elected President of the United States shall have the power by his selection of Secretary of State and so on to designate during the whole of his term if he be sick——

Mr. MORGAN. He has not that power, the Senator will allow me to say. The power can only be exercised by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I understand. The advice and consent of the Senate of the United States having been obtained to the appointment of a Cabinet, he has that power, and he has it during his lifetime without being dead, because in case of inability he has that power. You give therefore to him the power within a certain range of six or seven persons in succession, the absolute power himself, of naming who shall be the acting Chief Magistrate of the United States; and in case of his death that acting Chief Magistrate can not be displaced until the end of the four years, because you can not even change the law unless you have two-thirds of both Houses to do it, without his assent, and obtain a new election, and he might not be willing to assent.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me a word. That is the second instance named in the Constitution or law under which the Senate participates as an electoral body. The first is when an election of a Vice-President has failed before the electoral colleges; then the Senate elects a Vice-President, elects him for the full term. In that instance the Senate of the United States is the electoral body. The Constitution requires Congress to arrange by law for still another electoral body; that is to say, it can ordain by statute who shall fill this office. This bill provides that the person who has been chosen as Secretary of State in the first instance and consecutively on through the whole line of executive officers shall fill the office of President; but the Senate must concur in the ratification of the nomination of that person, so that virtually the Senate is twice made the electoral body in case of a failure in the office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, I had not entirely forgotten what the Constitution said on that subject, though I am much obliged to my friend from Alabama for reminding me of it.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say it for the purpose of reminding the Senator, but merely for the purpose of making a point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that. I am not speaking with any intention to reproach my friend. I had not reached that branch of the subject, to which I meant to refer. I may as well do it now.

It is true, as the Senator has said, that the Constitution provides in a certain instance, which I will not fill up the RECORD by amplifying upon, that the Senate of the United States shall elect a Vice-President, and that Vice-President by the Constitution may become the person who administers the executive office; whether President or not technically is of no consequence. That is perfectly true. But what is that action of the Senate? It is the action of all the States of this Union directly to one purpose and for one object and in the selection of a particular person to perform a particular duty and no other.

What does our own experience through all the years that we have been here and what does history tell us as to all our predecessors is the fixed practice, that can never be changed, of the Senate in advising and consenting to the appointment of gentlemen who are the heads of Departments called the Cabinet? Have we ever for a single moment hesitated, usually without a reference, to allow the President of the United States to be his own judge of the persons whom he would select as heads of Departments to assist him to exert his executive functions and carry on the Government? We have not considered what our independent judgment would have been if we had been the selecting body of those persons, because they by the very nature of their office are the confidential agents of the Executive, with whom he must confer and consult and with whom he must be on terms of the most intimate personal relations. We do not weigh, and we should not weigh if this bill were to be passed into a law, the question whether the present Secretary of State would be agreeable to us as President of the United States. If we did that, we should have divided on party lines on the nomination of Mr. Bayard, then and for many years an honored member of our own body, and I should have been obliged to advise the President of the United States not to select Mr. Bayard as a person to carry on the executive functions of this Government if I am an honest Republican, as I believe I am, because I do not think Mr. Bayard would make a good President, because I believe his policy and his views upon great public questions are wrong. He thinks they are right, and a majority of the States thought they were right, I suppose, in electing Mr. Cleveland. That is all true enough, and I only speak of it to illustrate the idea that in our approval of the selections of gentlemen to assist the President in carrying on the business of the Departments under the law we have never had and we never shall have under this or any other law any conscientious and steady reference to the question of their capacity or fitness to be President of the United States, what their policies would be, what their views might be; and the consequence is that as a fact we come down to the single fact, not that the representatives of the States have selected the persons whom they would have act in the case of a vacancy in both these offices, but they have selected the persons for the probable duties they are to be called upon to perform and no others, and they acquiesce in whatever selection within bounds—and those bounds are very wide—the Chief Magistrate may make. So he becomes in fact therefore, and in reality, the man who is to name his successor in office as this bill now has it, repealing these sections of a law which has been in force for nearly a century about a new election for the period it may be of almost four years. I regret that I can not agree to such a proposition.

The bill would be less unsatisfactory if what I believe has not been hitherto proposed, that is, the continuance in this office of the Secretary of State, and so on for the whole period of the term, were left out; and in order to test the sense of the Senate on that question, so that we may see what is its opinion in regard to leaving this office to run in the hands of a Secretary of State and so on for it may be near the full term or whether it desires to have the people of the United States, as our fathers did in case of a vacancy in both these offices, select another as soon as they could, I move to strike out section 3, which will leave the existing law for a new election in force.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kentucky will pardon me a moment. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, I desire to make a suggestion to him. He wishes to strike out of section 3 all the sections there enumerated but one, which I think is the first one named, as he will find if he will look at the statutes. He clearly wants to repeal one of those sections, whatever may be his view as to the rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Kentucky pardon me a moment until I get my amendment in the right form?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One hundred and forty-six is the section providing for the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House. I will leave that for the time being, and move to amend section 3 by striking out in lines 1, 2, and 3 the words "147, 148, 149, and 150," so as to leave the section standing, if this be stricken out:

That section 146 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

Which is the one providing for the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, after the words "one hundred and forty-six," in line 1, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the words "one hundred and fifty," in line 3, as follows: "One hundred and forty-seven, one hundred and forty-eight, one hundred and forty-nine, and one hundred and fifty;" so that the section when amended will read:

SEC. 3. That section 146 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was one other brief observation that I forgot to mention in connection with what I was saying. I should have added, as I have made no preparation for this discussion, in respect to what my friend from Alabama said as to these gentlemen being confirmed by the Senate, that if any one of them resigns or dies and so goes out of office in vacation, the Constitution itself gives the President of the United States the absolute power of appointing a new man of his own and commissioning him by a special commission to be Secretary of State, for instance, until the end of the next session of the Senate; and it is maintained by many that if the Senate does not confirm that man or some other, so as to leave the office vacant at the end of that next session, the President may again select of his own will the same man or some other person. That I do not agree to myself, but it is the opinion of a great many gentlemen for whose opinions about constitutional law I have a very great respect.

So it might happen, and in the course of human events it often would happen, that there would be for long periods of time, from the end of a short session to the beginning of a long one, months and months a person filling the office of Secretary of State for instance—I only mention one to save time in going over them all—who had been selected by the President of the United States alone, without the Senators, the representatives of the States, ever having been consulted; and that person, if an accident should happen to the President, then once in office by force of this bill, perhaps by force of circumstances, whatever the Senate did when it met again on his own nomination of himself to be Secretary of State to be confirmed, would continue to hold the office.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Vermont understand that by force of this bill such a person could ever have the duties of President devolved upon him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that that case is excepted in the second section. Will the Senator look at the second section of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the second section, and if that is what it is intended to mean——

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it helps the thing in that respect, only we have this difficulty: if the Secretary of State resigns in vacation and the Secretary of the Treasury (if he is the next man) comes to be the acting President, he then appoints somebody as acting President to be Secretary of State. When the Senate meets that name is sent in and it is confirmed. Which of these two gentlemen then acts, the Secretary of State having been confirmed by the action of the Senate and got that commission? Is it then the Secretary of State or is it the Secretary of the Treasury who is to be the President for the next three years? It may be that my friend from Massachusetts can explain that.

I am not making these observations for the purpose of any criticism of detail, but only in reference to the dangers of the complications arising of some man being called upon and put into the actual possession of the office of President of the United States for the period of three or four years, with the law for a new election repealed, whom the Senate have not intended should ever fill that office.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky pardon me for one-half minute?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The bill seems to be as clear upon the two matters which the Senator from Vermont has suggested certainly as I know how to make it by the use of the English language:

That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the Secretary of State. * * *

Skipping now the rest of the section—shall act as President until the disability of the President or Vice-President is removed or a President shall be elected.

Or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Treasury, and so on.

So when one of these officers has become authorized and required by law to act as President that authority never is divested, but he continues to the end of his term. So that meets the last suggestion. It does not seem to me to be left at all doubtful in the bill.

Then:

SEC. 2. That the preceding section shall only be held to describe and apply to such officers as shall have been appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate to the offices therein named, and such as are eligible to the office of President under the Constitution, and not under impeachment by the House of Representatives, &c.

That seems to dispose of the first objection of the Senator from Vermont. If there be a Secretary of State who has not been confirmed by the Senate it is a case of his inability; the duties of President then are to devolve upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the rest of the term. If he dies or his inability occurs then the next officer, and so on. You never go back up the ladder after you have gone down a round.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Even in a case of temporary sickness?

Mr. HOAR. I am not dealing with a case of temporary sickness, but only with the two propositions the Senator mentioned. The Senator asked me what I would say to a case of temporary sickness. What will happen in case of an inability within the meaning of the Constitution is a debated and difficult question, which the Judiciary Committee have tried for a good while to deal with by having a separate bill in regard to defining inability under the Constitution and providing for its being lawfully ascertained. The committee, in reporting this bill, do not design to deal with that difficulty. It would raise a doubtful question in a bill which we have desired to have as simple and clear and comprehensive as possible; and the whole question (which is a difficult one under the Constitution) will remain so. The Constitution has left it a difficult one. What constitutes inability and how the question of inability shall be ascertained, and what shall happen when an officer under inability has once ceased, temporarily or permanently, to act as President if inability or disability be removed—all that class of questions is left where the Constitution now leaves them, without undertaking to settle the problem by this bill, to be dealt with another time.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has expressed several regrets in regard to this bill. I rise to express my regret that he should assume that there was anything so very extraordinary in the statement I made a while ago. I thought I was in a very modest way giving my opinion that his bill ought to pass because it was likely to remove many of the difficulties which might arise under the present law. I did not attempt to enumerate them all; I had done that in previous debates.

It is very questionable in the minds of many persons, of whom I am one, whether the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Speaker of the House is an officer of the United States in the sense in which the Constitution provides that an officer shall be designated to fill the office of President in case of the death or inability of both the President and Vice-President. For example, it is very doubtful, after the term of the President of the Senate as a Senator has expired and he no longer represents his State, whether he can act as President; and so in regard to the Speaker of the House. It certainly would be very improper for him to sit in this body and sign bills after voting upon them as a Senator from a State, and then, if need be, veto them as President, and exercise many other functions which he would have to exercise as Chief Executive. On the other hand, his State might be deprived of her equal representation in the Senate by his having become disqualified to act if he should not still be a Senator. All these questions and many more have been discussed over and over again. The present condition of affairs is admitted on all hands to be bad.

I happened, however, to say at the opening of the present Congress, after the people of the United States had declared that the executive branch of this Government should be in the hands of the Democratic party for the next four years, if by reason of death or inability there had been neither a President nor Vice-President that I, however high my personal regard may be, entertaining no respect for the political methods of the distinguishe d Senator from Vermont, as he asserts he had none for those of the present Secretary of State, and being as pronounced a Democrat as he avows himself a Republican, having no sort of faith in his political sentiments, I might not have been in hot haste to rush up to the Senate on the first day of its session to make him the acting President of the United States, and thus overthrow the expressed will of the people of the United States as declared at the polls by electing him President pro tempore in order to turn over the functions of the executive branch of the Government into his hands to be managed in his way, when a House of Representatives Democratic to the core, and meeting on the same day at the other end of the Capitol, would almost at the same minute elect a Democratic Speaker in accordance with the people's expressed will and do it under the forms of law. That suggestion as to a possibility to be guarded against is in his judgment revolutionary!

Mr. President, if gentlemen look over the Electoral Commission act of 1876, the "if any" and all the other technicalities that were thrown into it in order to give the Republican party advantage, they can see, I think, much further than most men if they can see anything revolutionary in the suggestion I made that difficulties might have ensued on the question as to whether the Speaker of the House was entitled to hold the place and should have priority of right over the Senate when the other party in this body was seeking to overthrow and annul the well-known will of the people and by an unforeseen accident place some gentleman in that high place who could not have been placed there by the popular vote. The Republican Senators knew as well on the morning of the first day of the session that the people had declared that there should be a Democratic administration for four years as I did. I might say it was as revolutionary in them, through their representatives who were present in this body, to refuse to elect a President pro tempore of the Senate who was in full accord with his party and the known wishes of the people as declared at the polls, as to ask Democrats to aid them, when they could not do it themselves on that day, to place a man in this chair in order to enable him to discharge the functions of President, and thus overthrow the expressed wish and policy which the people declared they desired.

But I only suggested that as one of the difficulties that might have arisen, and as a reason why this bill or some bill like it should become a law. I had no idea of revolution, conspiracy, or treason in my mind. I was earnestly endeavoring to aid in doing something to get clear of the present difficulties and dangers by which all admit we are now surrounded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Republican members of the Senate of the United States, I believe—and I think I am safe in speaking for them all in this—have never asked, they do not ask now, and probably never will ask, the Democratic members of the Senate to help them in that character to do anything at all. We did not wish the Senator from Kentucky to be in hot haste to come into this Chamber and help the Republicans of this body elect a President pro tempore; but we did wish and believe that the State of Kentucky would perform her constitutional duty in selecting Senators who would perform their constitutional duty, not because they were Democrats or Republicans, but because they were Senators, in coming into this Chamber at the time appointed by law and help to form a quorum of this body for the doing of business. That, I believe, is the Republican attitude; at any rate it is mine.

Suppose the same theory should be extended a little further, as it was by one party in this Chamber in the year 1881, if I am right in my dates, who refused to allow the credentials of three regularly elected Senators to be acted upon in this body, there being no doubt or question as to their being the due and lawful representatives of their States here, to take the oath of office until that party had elected a President pro tempore of its own, and in the hope that he, not only against the will of the people but against the will of the majority of this body, once in, could be kept in indefinitely. That enterprise failed. I am happy to believe in this Republic that all revolutionary enterprises will fail as they have failed hitherto, whether carried on upon a large scale or whether carried on upon a small scale.

Mr. MORGAN. How about that of 1776?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was not a revolutionary operation of this Government. It was a revolutionary operation under the Empire of Great Britain, of which we then formed a part. I suggest the difference to the thoughtful consideration of my friend.

Suppose this notion were carried a little further, and that on the 7th of December, no quorum appearing in this body because Democratic members chose to absent themselves for the reason stated, suppose the somewhat formidable and respectable and intelligent minority of the House of Representatives had set up a counter revolution and in obedience to the somewhat mysterious rules, as it is said, of that body, had contrived to filibuster for a week or two or three weeks or an indefinite length of time, as you, Mr. President, have known years ago to have been done, so as to prevent the election of a Speaker at all until the Senate in this supposed race for power could get a quorum together and act, would that be a spectacle to be encouraged? Would it not come pretty near to being moral treason on the part of the Republican minority over there? I should think so. But what is treason in a Republican may be patriotism in a Democrat for aught that I know. I will not undertake to solve a question of that kind. No, Mr. President; what the people of the United States said when they elected their last President and Vice-President was that they were carrying on a Government under a constitution and under laws passed in pursuance of that Constitution, as they then stood, and they therefore had provided in that election that in case of a vacancy in both the offices of President and Vice-President the President pro tempore of the Senate, of whatever political opinions he might happen to be, should carry on this Government until a new election should be had, if there were a President pro tempore, and if there were not, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of whatever political opinions he might be, should do the same thing. That was what the people did in their election, if, as I believe, they are a people who respect their own Constitution and the laws that are made in pursuance of it.

So there would not have been a terrible catastrophe to this Republic if it should have happened at some time or if it shall happen again that the President of this body or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, being here the selected representative of all the States and being there the selected representative of all the people of the United States in their character purely as a people, should administer this Government for the period of a month or two or three, whatever the time required by law to have a new election. That is all there is to it, and it appears to me therefore that it is not wise, particularly not wise to say that this person, when he is once selected by the President as Secretary and when the vacancy once occurs, shall by force of law and in spite of the will of the people in a new election hold on to that office for what may be nearly four years. On the question of striking out these election sections I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, being the consideration of the joint rules.

Mr. HOAR. I move to proceed with the present bill. I think that was the understanding when I gave way to the joint rules yesterday. It was not intended to have this bill displaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone the consideration of the joint rules. If there is no objection that will be considered as agreed to, and the bill remains before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow the unfinished business to be laid aside informally. I recognize the importance of this bill, more important of course than the joint rules, but I do not want them to be displaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection, but I suppose in the present condition of the business of the Senate there will probably be no practical difficulty.

Mr. FRYE. There is a court bill between.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally by common consent and the pending bill proceeded with.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I asked for the yeas and nays, and I wish that they may be ordered on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, this great question has been so much thought over and so much debated, both by members of Congress and through the newspaper press and in the periodicals of the day, and not of this day only but of former days, that I will not essay the vain and unnecessary effort of thrashing over old straw in the presentation of my views in support of this bill. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate distinctly to its provisions, to see if there can be any possible misunderstanding about them, for the bill is radical in its nature, works an entire change in the method of performing a duty devolved by the Constitution upon Congress, and we ought to be very careful to know that we are agreed about all things that are contained in it.

In the event of the death of the present incumbent of the office of President of the United States there would devolve upon Congress under Article II of the Constitution, section 1, a distinct and peculiar duty, provided for in this clause:

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

This duty has been provided for in existing laws, but in a manner not satisfactory to the country, and, as some persons believe, not in a manner warranted by the Constitution.

It is obvious that there can be only one event in which this duty devolves upon Congress; that is the death, disability, or removal both of the President and Vice-President elected by the college of electors according to the Constitution and the laws. This bill presupposes the happening of such a contingency and undertakes to provide for it. There can be no doubt of the right of Congress to presuppose the happening of such a contingency and to provide for it in advance. That was done under the statute which is now upon the book, and what Congress is now seeking to do is to change the nature and character of that statute.

So far, then, there is no dispute, I suppose, on the part of any person as to the right of Congress to anticipate the unhappy event of a vacancy in the office of both the President and Vice-President, and provide by law (for that is the only way in which Congress can provide) for the discharge of the duties of the office of President. This power conferred upon Congress has a limitation imposed upon it. Congress shall provide only for filling that office during the disability until it is removed, or, in case of the death or resignation of the President and Vice-President, until a President is elected. We can not provide an absolute successorship and for a full term in the case that I have supposed; we can only provide for a succession subject to the condition that it shall continue only during the disability or until a President is elected. That is one restriction upon our power, and that restriction is observed in this bill.

The next restriction is that we shall select an "officer" for the purpose of performing these duties or to act as President. The Constitution is as well interpreted frequently by what is omitted from it as by what is contained in it. In this case there is an express designation in the Constitution of the particular class of persons from whom this selection shall be made by law; that is to say, they are to be "officers" and all other persons are omitted. There is but one class of men who are eligible under the Constitution of the United States to fill the vacancy in the office occasioned by the death, disability, or removal of the President and the Vice-President; that class of persons are "officers," so nominated in the Constitution. This clause of the Constitution did not confer, as I understand, the power upon Congress to create a new office or an officer for the particular occasion, but only a power to select from the then existing list of officers the person who should fill this particular vacancy in the office created by the Constitution and to discharge these particular functions.

The view of the framers of the Constitution seems to have been that in the selection of the line of the officers who might become eligible by statute to the office of Presidency of the United States in the emergency which I have mentioned, those functionaries of the Government who have an agency in the selection of officers would be guarded and admonished continually by the possibility that those officers might be called upon to discharge the highest executive power under this Government, and that the framers of the Constitution were not willing to leave it to be determined by Congress what office should be created and what officer should be appointed to fill that office so that he might become eligible after the fact had occurred that the office of President of the United States and Vice-President had become vacated by death, resignation, or removal.

The most dangerous legislation that could be conceived would be that of declaring by act of Congress who should fill the Presidential office after it had become vacant, and whether he should hold the office for four years or only for an unexpired term.

There were certainly very substantial reasons why this phrase of language which I have quoted should have been used in the Constitution, looking to the security and the permanency of the establishment of the Government of the United States and also of those interests of the people which might be in the control of its political agents at the time of the happening of such an event as is spoken of in this clause of the Constitution. I therefore conclude that the power of Congress in passing a law on this subject is limited to selecting from officers of the United States Government some one whom Congress by law shall have declared, in advance, to be eligible to the office of President upon the death, or resignation, or the disability of the President and Vice-President.

To be an "officer" within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution of the United States, he must be an officer of the United States. There should be no question upon that point in the designation of the officer in an act of Congress. Indeed, in legislating upon a subject like this, there should be no question upon any point that we could preclude by any sort of care and caution in wording such legislation. I consider that this interpretation is strictly correct, and it is clearly followed in this bill. The term "officer" used in this clause of the Constitution refers only to the officers who are such under the laws and Constitution of the United States, officers of the Government of the United States, officers responsible to that Government, officers who derive their commission and authority from that Government and from no other.

Now, a Senator of the United States can scarcely be called in any sense an officer of the United States. He is an officer of a different government, an officer whose election is declared and provided for by a State, whose commission is issued by a State; who comes here more in the character of an embassador from a State than, perhaps, in any other character, for he represents not merely the great body of the people of a State, but he represents them in their organic capacity. He represents them as the chosen man selected by the Legislature in the exercise of the highest local sovereignty. Holding that commission, he comes here not amenable to the President of the United States for his commission, or to the Supreme Court for his authority, or to Congress for his conduct; he is made amenable by the Constitution to the particular House of which he is a member and which is the sole and final judge of his election and his qualifications. A man filling that peculiar attitude, and having so many of his high powers derived from other authority than that of the Government of the United States, can scarcely be called an officer of the United States. He is far more an officer of his State than he is of the United States.

No man can be considered eligible to the office of President of the United States through the mere act or declaration of the Senate, or through the declaration of Congress, if you please, who is a member of either House of Congress; for in that capacity he is not an officer of the United States and is not included within the meaning of the language of the clause of the Constitution which I have read. Choosing a Senator as President pro tempore does not make him an officer of the United States.

More than that; as was argued by the Senator from Massachusetts very briefly on yesterday, but on a previous occasion much more elaborately, and by various Senators in debate here on former occasions, the duties which are devolved upon the presiding officer of the Senate of the United States are incompatible, in a large sense, with the duties of the executive office of the United States. For instance, the President pro tempore of the Senate ought to be here presiding in this body and assisting in its proceedings. He has no right or power to delegate his authority to another. He is a Senator, representing his State, and we can not, by a vote, excuse him permanently from that service. If he resigns, his resignation is sent to the governor of his State.

The Constitution expressly declares that a State shall not be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate except by its own consent. So the Senate can impose no duty by its vote upon any Senator which disqualifies him from sitting in the Senate and performing all his functions as a Senator here. If we should confer upon him by our election of him as President pro tempore of this body the power and functions and duties of President of the United States, we should confer upon him many duties, obligations, and powers which he can not exercise as a Senator, and in the exercise of which he would be necessarily carried away from the body sitting in this Chamber.

In case of war, suppose that the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who is distinguished in the history of his country as a commander, should be the President pro tempore of the Senate, and he should deem that it was his conscientious and constitutional duty to take charge of the troops in the field to meet some great emergency which a foreign invasion might press upon the country, could he go abroad and take command of the armies in the field and yet retain his position as President pro tempore of the Senate? Certainly not; and yet in a case of that kind, where his higher duties to the Government and the people call him to the field, what should we do here? Should we have two Presidents pro tempore? The Constitution says we shall have but one, and certainly not more than one, at a time. Should we, in an event of that kind, elect a successor? If we did, the moment we elected him he would take the command from the officer in the field, and that Senator would have to return to his duties here as a Senator, as an ordinary member of this body.

These are inconveniences which have been referred to in debate, but in my judgment there is a principle underlying this which is much more important than any inconvenience which might be cited by way of illustration to show the impropriety of such a condition of things, and that is the blending and confusion of the functions of the great departments of this Government. If there is a point in legislation about which the Senate of the United States ought to be always cautious and always vigilant, it is that it will not encourage, and certainly that it will not promote, any invasion of the rights and powers of one of the coordinate branches of the Government. The powers and duties of the executive branch of the Government of the United States as defined and prescribed in the Constitution are entirely distinct from those of the Senate and of Congress. We ought to do nothing to blend or to unite these greats departments in a common head, or to confer upon one man full and complete power to discharge the functions of both at the same time. That was an error in the legislation which is upon the statute-book that ought never to have crept into it, and I dare say would never have done so but under the pressure of some particular party incentive or agitation as the time that statute was passed.

The President pro tempore of the Senate sits in that chair as a member of the Senate and as presiding officer of the Senate. If he is also President of the United States he sends from that chair his appointments to this body, and they are discussed and voted upon, and he as a Senator votes to confirm the appointments made by him as President of the United States. He votes upon bills that are passed through this body; he votes against a measure, and afterwards as President he vetoes it. From that desk he lays his veto message before the Senate of the United States, the body in which the bill originated. On a call of the yeas and nays, when it requires two-thirds of the Senate to pass the bill over his veto, as a Senator he votes to sustain his veto made by himself as President of the United States. Can there be a plainer case of the unavoidable blending of the functions of two of the great departmental organizations of this Government in a way which tears down the limitations which the Constitution built around each of them?

I have, therefore, not been able to doubt that it is the duty of Congress to select some other person than the President of the Senate or Speaker of the House of Representatives—some person who by law is an officer of the United States at the time the event occurs when there is a vacancy in both the office of President and Vice-President of this country; and naturally and properly the officer to be selected ought to belong to the executive department of the Government. We would naturally take the highest officer first, the officer of greatest rank. He would be, as this bill describes, the Secretary of State. Who is the Secretary of State? An officer selected by the President of the United States for nomination, whose nomination is sent to the Senate and considered by that body, and who is afterward appointed to the office because the Senate advises and consents to it.

The constitutional language is, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." There must be affirmative action taken here, and the vote of this body by its majority must show that the consent has been given by this body before a commission can issue from the President to a Secretary of State. Therefore in every essential sense the Secretary of State is as much chosen by the consent of the Senate as he is selected by the consent and approval of the President; and while we do not perform the entire office of selecting him, we perform that most essential part of it—without which he can never have the commission given—we advise and consent to his selection.

Here, then, the States of this Union, representing the people in their organic capacity through their Senators upon this floor, representing also the popular constituencies by which they were chosen in the respective States, unite their voices with the President in the selection of a Secretary of State; and when that is done, barring the fact that no nomination is required to be made by the President of the United States in the case of the election of a Vice-President when the electors have failed to choose, all the conditions have been fulfilled by the Senate in the selection of a Secretary of State that are performed when we elect a Vice-President, and it is done in precisely the same manner. It must be remembered that when the House of Representatives votes for the election of a President in case the electors have not chosen a President, that vote is by States. When the Senate votes to choose a Vice-President, that vote is per capita here. Why the difference? Because the States are represented by the Senators.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama if there is any possibility of a vote other than by States in the Senate? Am I to understand him to indicate that in his judgment there can be from the nature and character of the body anything but a vote by States? That is, if the two Senators from a State agree they cast exactly the vote of their State.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course.

Mr. HOAR. If they disagree, there is no vote cast; practically it comes to the same thing.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand that that is the rule in the election of the Vice-President. In the election of the Vice-President the Senate votes per capita.

Mr. HOAR. But my proposition is whether it is possible that a vote per capita in a body in which each State contributes two votes can be anything but a vote by States in the nature of the case?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly not.

Mr. HOAR. In other words, suppose the Constitution said that all votes or any particular vote in the Senate should be by States. If the two Senators agree, then it would be a vote by States. If the two Senators from any State differ, then there is no vote at all.

Mr. MORGAN. It is practically a combination of the two ideas of a vote by the people through their representatives in the Senate. Their representatives vote per capita, but they vote also by States. And this is necessary because the small States must have equal power here with the larger States. In our organization Rhode Island has the same power with New York. A Vice-President chosen by the Senate would be chosen by a per capita vote of the Senators, an individual vote, and in that respect he would represent the political opinion in the States, and sometimes, as in the case of Ohio, where one Senator represents the Democratic party and another represents the Republican party. But Ohio, great as it is in population and in wealth, has no higher power in the election of a Vice-President in the emergency I have mentioned than has the State of Delaware or the State of Rhode Island.

But I was looking at the analogy of the method of the election of a Vice-President by the Senate, as provided in the Constitution, and the selection, as I call it, of a Secretary of State. The difference between the two methods is so slight in its practical effect and in its political effect that they may be called almost identical.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I sustain this bill. I believe that we are in the right line, and I believe every safeguard that was intended by the framers of the Constitution to protect the country against agitation and to have a fair expression by States and by people of their will in the election of their Chief Magistrate is secured when we select from the officers who have been confirmed by the Senate in the executive branch of this Government.

Now another question is presented on this bill, and it is the one which is affected by the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont. I have not looked up carefully the history of legislation and of debate upon this question to determine whether that point has ever been distinctly raised and passed upon by Congress. Some Senators here who are better informed than I am will doubtless bring out the fact in the course of the debate if such a thing has ever occurred; but the effect of this bill if passed as reported by the committee will be to declare that the office of President, when vacated by the death or resignation of both the President and Vice-President, is vacated for the four years' term, and that it is within the competency of Congress to provide by law for the filling up of that vacancy by supplying an officer to discharge the duties of President during the remainder of that term. I am anxious to know, and I shall continue to be anxious to know until the matter is stated by some authorized member of the Committee of the Judiciary, whether the meaning of this bill is distinctly clear that the Secretary of State, if perchance he should take office under this law, will hold for the residue of the unexpired term of four years from the time he is inaugurated in the Presidency. There ought to be no room for doubt about that, no question about it; and if any amendment of this bill is necessary in order to make its language thoroughly distinct upon that proposition, it should be resorted to.

As I understand the bill, the Secretary of State, if he should take office under this law, would take for the remainder of the unexpired term of four years. That is to say, if the President of the United States should die on the 4th day of March next the officer the law selects by this statute to act as President would act from the 4th of March next for the three years of the unexpired term. I not only believe that that is constitutional, but I believe that this feature of the bill is required under the mandate of the Constitution, and that a bill otherwise framed is not constitutional. I believe it was the design of the framers of the Constitution that when the Congress of the United States should provide by law for filling up the vacancy in the event named in the clause I have quoted, it should so provide as that the vacancy should be filled up for the whole time until the next general election for President should occur after the expiration of the preceding constitutional term of four years. I wish to submit a very few observations in support of that proposition.

The first provision in the Constitution in Article II, section 1, is as follows:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

That investiture by constitutional authority of the executive power, as defined in the Constitution, of course is beyond the reach of all legislative control. No act of Congress can reduce or abate or modify or change the executive power prescribed in the Constitution, which is thus vested in whom? "The President of the United States of America." The investiture is full, plenary, and when made is beyond the reach of legislative interference and equally beyond the reach of the interference of any other department of the Government.

> He shall hold his office during the term of four years.

Whose office does he hold? "His office," the office conferred upon him in accordance with the Constitution and the law. How long shall he hold it? During the term of four years. There is then a term of office prescribed, and that term of office is as distinct a part of the Constitution as the office itself. The powers conferred upon the Executive, and the manner of conferring these powers upon the Executive, are not more distinct, more limited, more definite in the Constitution than is the office itself and the term of that office. It is a four years' term, and it is the office of a particular person for that term, unless he dies, resigns, or is disabled from holding it.

Was there no reason why the fathers of this Republic should have fashioned a four years' term for the Presidential office? It seems to me that there was every reason why they should have done so. The devolution of power into the hands of the President of the United States is not a compliment to him; it is not a private trust conferred upon him; not a conferring of rights or authority which the people of the United States bestow upon him to reward him for services never so great. It is the expression of the wishes of the people of the United States in respect of all current political questions, and by political I mean governmental. The object was to give permanency to the tenure of office and to an established policy of government, not to have it fluctuating continually.

The example of the British Government stood before the eyes of our people in every movement that they made upon the ordination of every part of the framework of this Constitution. What was their theory and their system? It was that the sovereign power which, to the extent that we confer sovereignty on him, we have bestowed in the President of the United States, which in England was vested in the Crown. The Crown was a continuing power, changed from one king to another by blood, by inheritance.

But the House of Commons was the representative body of the political opinions and sentiments of the people, and first traditionally and afterward constitutionally that House of Commons acquired the power of so expressing the will of those people, not so as to change the actual sovereignty, not so as to interfere with the tenure of office inuring to the Crown of Great Britain or the person who held it, but merely the political complexion of the persons who might be managing the subordinate departments of the Government, the cabinet officers. Our fathers so ordered that the President, for the term of four years, should represent the political opinions of the people, and also the sovereign executive powers of the Government.

Our fathers had that in view when they adopted this Constitution. We did not want to have a king in this country; we did not want to have any officer elected to the Presidency for life. We wanted to have a term of office, not measured at all by the life of the man who might fill it at any time, but measured by the Constitution. We wanted to have a succession that should come quadrennially. Not the power by an expression of the people's will in the House of Representatives to change the executive officers of the Government, but every four years the people of the United States were to have the opportunity of giving expression through the ballot-box and through their electors to their wishes in such form as that they might supply a new man to take the new term of office.

Sir, if you should strike these words, "term of four years," out of this Constitution would it make any impression upon the instrument? It would so emasculate it that it could never again be read in the sense in which you read it with those words in. Therefore any action on the part of Congress which ignores the existence of these words does emasculate the Constitution, and does take out of it those important words which were put there to fix and define the limitation of a four years' term.

When we come to supplying an incumbent for that office language equally distinct, emphatic, and pointed is employed:

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President.

What shall devolve? The office with its term. Does the Constitution say that the Vice-President shall hold for four years from the time of the devolution? Certainly not. Does it say that he shall hold until a President shall be selected by some special act of Congress? Certainly not. The office devolves upon him, and after the devolution the question is what is the length of the term? Everbody concedes, as everybody has always conceded, that it is for the balance of the Presidential term, and yet the Constitution is utterly silent in that clause which creates and compels the devolution, utterly silent as to the length of time the Vice-President shall continue in office. He takes the office that the President took. He takes the term that the President took. He takes the same office and same term to which he, along with the President, was chosen by the people at the same time, and without any language in the Constitution to define that his term shall be four years or only the remainder of an unexpired Presidential term of four years, he takes it for the residue of the "term" of four years prescribed in the Constitution.

I proceed further to draw evidence from this clause of the Constitution in support of my views:

> The same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The Constitution of the United States provided in every essential way for the election of a President, and if there had never been a statute passed by Congress the President of the United States could still have been lawfully elected. The Presidential election in a very large measure is left to the States, because they choose the electors. They may do it by a general vote of the people, or they may do it by districts, or they may do it by their Legislature. They may do it pretty much in their own way, so that it is a republican way, only they must all elect at the same time fixed by the law, and their electors must have certain qualifications. Now what is the meaning of this language, "or a President shall be elected?" It means a President elected in conformity with the Constitution, and not merely in conformity with an act of Congress. A President shall be elected on the expiration of the previous constitutional term of four years, for it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the people should be agitated by general Presidential elections perhaps three or four times during a quadrennial term. It was, on the contrary, the intention that they should have one opportunity every four years to impress themselves upon the policy of this Government in the election of their Chief Magistrate, and every two years in the election of their representatives in the House, and every six years in the election of their representatives in the Senate. Those were the opportunities given by the Constitution to the people for the exercise of the power which they rightfully possess under the Constitution of choosing their representatives and their rulers, if that term is not a misnomer.

I therefore conclude that any act of Congress which would call for an election of a President of the United States to take the office before the expiration of the preceding term of four years would be an act that would violate the spirit if not the language of the Constitution. It would disturb the constitutional system and bring incalculable inconvenience and perhaps mischief upon the country, for I can conceive of nothing that would be more dangerous to the public peace and welfare than the change of the Presidential term of office and the change of the President of the United States by elections that might occur as often as once a year or even oftener.

For these reasons I support this bill. I now see the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his seat, and I desire to repeat the inquiry whether there is any doubt at all under this bill that the officer who may be chosen to act as President under this law would hold for the entire unexpired term of four years?

Mr. HOAR. I understand there is no doubt on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as a member of the committee that reported this bill, I withheld my approval from that provision of the bill which the Senator from Vermont has moved to strike out. I am of the opinion that in case of the death of the President and Vice-President the country would be much better satisfied with an election as provided by the old statute than as proposed by the pending bill. Therefore I shall vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill, but in doing so I desire to say that the sole meritorious feature of the bill, to my mind, is that it preserves the decree of the people in regard to executive policy for the term for which the preceding President and Vice-President were elected. I do not concur in the idea that a Senator of the United States is not an officer of the United States, or that the President of the Senate, elected as a temporary President, is not an officer of the United States, or that the Speaker of the House of Representatives is not an officer of the United States. I can not see the ground for such an argument. The Senate of the United States is a constitutional body, created under the Constitution of the United States. The Senators are charged with duties created by the Constitution alone, and so of the members of the House of Representatives. Their sole existence and their sole function is derived entirely from their relation to the Constitution of the United States and their representing the constitutional duties and functions created by that instrument.

Therefore, sir, I can not see the ground of an argument upon that subject, nor do I think that this bill is the best plan of succession that could be devised. I believe that it would be more consistent with the character of this Government that the two Houses of Congress should alternately, as designed in the present law, declare who should be the successor in case of the decease or disability of the President and Vice-President, and I believe if that law were amended so as to make it obligatory upon Congress to select a person representing the political opinion of the deceased President to carry into effect the popular decree, the will of the people constitutionally expressed at the last preceding election in regard to the executive policy, that would be an entirely proper and consistent manner of declaring the succession to the Presidency. And I also think it would be more consistent with the character of this Government that the electors chosen by the people who elected the deceased President should continue in power and be reconvened to express again the will of the people who had elected them as to the successor of the deceased President, who should be charged with the duty of carrying out the executive policy as declared by the people when they were elected.

But that is not the question, sir. I shall support the bill as it stands because it has the redeeming feature that it carries into effect the will of the people in regard to the executive policy as expressed at the last election for the constitutional term of four years.

On this point the proposition is clear and incontrovertible that no power is expressly given to Congress to change the Presidential term from four years to any greater or shorter time, and that the Constitution has fixed the term at four years and requires an election every four years; and that it provides for a vacancy and for filling it without an election. These several propositions seem to leave no ground for the conclusion that there is either an express or implied power conferred on Congress to provide for any other election than the quadrennial one expressly required by the Constitution.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from New York would as lief address the Senate to-morrow morning as this afternoon, and I understand there is a very large number of executive messages to be dealt with by the Senate. I desire to say that there are three measures now which are ripe for the action of the Senate which have been taken up; several others I dare say; but there are three that I happen to have in my mind—the measure now pending; the joint rules, which have been considerably discussed, and the bill in regard to the salaries of district judges, to which the Senator from Alabama I think has moved an amendment. I hope the Senate will sit on Thursday and Friday, if necessary, long enough to dispose of these bills, without adjourning from Thursday to Monday, as is sometimes done at this period of the session. I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the two in which I have especial interest this week.

I now move, with the leave of the Senator from New York, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chairman of the Joint Commission for the Completion of the Washington Monument, transmitting his annual report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DAWSON, by unanimous consent, was granted an indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness.

PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution for immediate consideration, to which I think there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to use so much of the contingent fund, not exceeding $600, as was appropriated by the act of March 3, 1885, for the use of the Interior Department, as may be necessary to put in proper order the rooms in the Interior Department building which have been assigned by the Secretary for the use of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Allow me one single moment. The honorable Secretary of the Interior has designated certain rooms for the use of the Commissioner of Patents. They are required to be repaired and put in order so as to fit them for the use for which they were intended. The contingent fund is ample. It is the opinion of the officers of that Department that they are authorized to use the fund appropriated for contingent expenses, but the Comptroller of the Treasury thinks additional legislation is required, and to remove any doubt this joint resolution ought to pass, specially authorizing the use of the contingent fund for that purpose. I do this at the suggestion of the Department.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a certain portion of the contingent fund of that Department for certain purposes was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO RULES.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following proposed amendment; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules, and ordered to be printed:

Leave to print in the RECORD shall be allowed only when a question is under consideration by the House, and such leave shall authorize remarks in order in the discussion of such question and none other, and such remarks shall first appear in the RECORD before the final adjournment of the session.

ALEXANDER R. LAWTON.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 118) for the relief of Alexander R. Lawton, of the State of Georgia. This is a bill which passed the Senate, relieving the political disabilities of Mr. Lawton, and I ask that it be taken up and passed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objections.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Alexander R. Lawton, of the State of Georgia, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I offer for reference to the Committee on Rules the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That members desiring to see correspondents of the press occupying seats in the reporters' gallery are hereby allowed to receive them in the rooms in the rear of the Speaker's desk.

The proposed amendment was referred to the Committee on Rules, and ordered to be printed.

THE RULES.

Mr. HERBERT addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama rise to discuss the subject under consideration at the time of the adjournment on yesterday?

Mr. HERBERT. That is my purpose in rising.

Mr. Speaker, I favor every proposition contained in the report of the majority of the Committee on Rules with a single exception, and I regret that in that respect I am not able to follow their report. The provision reinstating the morning hour for the consideration of bills will tend very largely in my opinion to the facilitation of the business of the House by giving each committee in turn an opportunity to put before the House for its consideration such legislation as it may have matured. The other and new provision, that the important committees of this House, organized for purposes of public legislation, shall not have their time consumed by the importunities of members begging committeemen to take up and consider private bills of their constituents, is a much needed reform, and one I have long been in favor of. It will enable these committees to effect more rapidly and to present sooner and in better shape for the consideration of the House proposed public legislation.

The proposition I find myself unable to favor is that relating to the distribution of the powers now exercised by the Committee on Appropriations. While opposed to that provision as incorporated into the report of the committee, I do most heartily favor the proposal to strike down that provision in the existing rules known as the Holman amendment, adopted ten years ago, and under which legislation that changes existing law is upon certain conditions in order upon an appropriation bill.

That amendment, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, has been much misunderstood. There has prevailed a common idea among many members of the House that it was simply a limitation of an already existing right. There was an impression that but for the existence of that amendment the power existed without limitation to amend appropriation bills by the addition of any kind of legislation that was germane. That is not true.

Up to the time of the passage of the Holman amendment in the Forty-fourth Congress an appropriation bill was in theory at least and according to rule what it purported to be, simply a bill appropriating money, and nothing more. The Committee on Appropriations had up to that time no power to recommend legislation that changed existing law. It was the Holman amendment which conferred that power.

The true theory of correct legislation is that every bill ought to stand or fall upon its own merits. That is the last result of the best thought of this generation; and you will find it crystallized in the constitution of nearly, if not quite, every State in this Union which has made a new constitution or largely amended its old constitution within the last twenty years. You will find provisions prescribing in one form or another that every bill shall contain but one subject-matter. The purpose of such a provision is that no proposition before a legislative body shall be hindered or advanced by being coupled with another.

Now, this Holman amendment, adopted in the Forty-fourth Congress—I understand, for I was not in that Congress—worked very well at that time. Let that much be conceded. The crucial test of its operation, however, came in the Forty-fifth Congress. In that Congress three amendments, each one of them more or less political in its nature, were put upon the appropriation bills by a Democratic House and sent to a Republican Senate. That was my first Congress, and I remember well wherein that Holman amendment served the Democratic party and wherein it failed us. It served us in this, that it gave us a good jury law, and that was a most beneficent gift. It failed us in these, that it gave us but a small portion of our demand that troops should not be crowded to the polls at the time of an election. It gave us no part of our demand that the laws providing for Federal interference in and superintendence of elections should be repealed. It gave us an extra session of Congress, and it gave us in the election for the Forty-seventh Congress defeat. The discussions of the questions involved at that time convinced this country, I believe—they certainly convinced me, coupled with the results which followed—that it was not a wise plan for a Democratic House to put a political rider upon an appropriation bill and send it to the Senate when that body was Republican.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the same condition now as we were then. The House was Democratic then; it is Democratic now. The Senate was Republican then; it is Republican now. But there is this difference. We know now the position the Senate takes, though we did not know it then, at least till we tried it. We know now that not only are the Republican Senators opposed to this method of legislation, but the Democratic Senators also. In the last Congress we sent over to the Senate two very important pieces of legislation upon appropriation bills. One was in relation to pensions. A bill similar in every respect, I believe—I have been so told; I have not examined it—had already passed the Senate unanimously. And yet when that same bill, favored unanimously by the Senators individually, came to them as a rider upon an appropriation bill they struck it off. If that same legislation had been sent to that Republican Senate as an independent bill their action shows they would not have dared to reject it. If they had the country would have held them responsible. As it was they rejected it with impunity, and the country says, if it says anything about it, they were right in doing it, because it infringed one of their rules, a rule they have a right to establish, and a rule, I believe, upon which the country insists.

There was another piece of legislation which many of my Democratic friends here had at heart just as I had. That also we sent over to the Senate last session. It was the bill in relation to marshals and district attorneys and United States commissioners, giving salaries instead of fees to the marshals and attorneys and limiting and defining the jurisdiction of the commissioners. That bill was considered here at great length in two committees. The provisions of it were finally agreed upon. It was put upon an appropriation bill and carried over to the Senate in that shape. I had it much at heart and followed it over there. The result of my conversations and investigations there was the belief that the Senate would have passed that bill, and we would have that good law in existence to-day, had it been sent to them as an independent measure. As it is, they feel themselves justified before the country in having rejected it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why shall we adhere to such a mode of legislation as this? It is by adhering to that amendment, as I believe, and claiming the power and authority it conferred, and thus largely monopolizing the power of legislation in this House, that the great Committee on Appropriations has raised up for itself enemies here; and if it finds itself finally dismembered it has largely to thank the Holman amendment for that result. That amendment has been somewhat changed or modified by the gentleman who has made a report as a minority of the committee; and I suppose he hopes that in its modified form it will pass. I think I have demonstrated that it is vicious in principle and that we can hope to gain nothing whatever by it; and if it be vicious in principle, it ought to be stricken down entirely.

Up to this point, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I go heartily with the majority of the Committee on Rules. I want to strike off that Holman amendment. I want to rob the Committee on Appropriations of this power to monopolize legislation on this floor. Whether intended on the part of members of that committee or not—and I do not charge that they have had any such intention—the result of that rule, coupled with this fact that all other avenues to the consideration of bills seem to have been closed by the rules which we had, did give that committee a monopoly of the legislation of this House in previous Congresses. Let us take away that right. Let us confine the Committee on Appropriations to what is its legitimate purpose, that of recommending in the first instance to this House how much money shall be spent and for what purposes. If this be done we shall not find, in my opinion, such complaints made against the Appropriations Committee in the future as have been made against it in the two past Congresses.

I do not think, my Democratic friends, that we ought now, when for the first time in twenty-four years we have a Democratic administration, to attempt any such novel experiments as the committee proposes when it recommends the taking away of half the power of the Committee on Appropriations and its distribution among six other committees. Look back at the history of this country. This Government has been in existence nearly one hundred years. Forty-eight Congresses have preceded us, and in not one of them was ever such distribution of powers made as is now proposed by the report of the majority of the committee. Up to 1865 one committee not only laid taxes but appropriated the moneys, and up to the Forty-sixth Congress one committee continued to have complete jurisdiction over all appropriation bills.

Then there was made a change as to two of these bills—and why? The time had come when this House and the country wanted larger appropriations for rivers and harbors. Therefore it was, and for the very purpose of getting the larger appropriations, that full jurisdiction over the bill for rivers and harbors was conferred upon a separate committee. We got just exactly what was expected and wanted.

So, too, the country and this House wanted larger appropriations for the Agricultural Bureau, and because we wanted these larger appropriations this House conferred upon the Agricultural Committee the right to appropriate for the purposes of that bureau, and we got what we wanted and what we expected.

Now the question is, what do you want for the future? What do you want as to all the other departments of this Government? Do you wish a larger and, if you please so to call it, a more liberal expenditure of money than heretofore? Have we not been scattering the people's money fast enough? If we have not, then do as you did in the case of the agricultural appropriation bill, do as you did in the case of the river and harbor bill, and you will have like results. Scatter the appropriation bills and you will scatter the people's money.

For myself, I believe it to be the duty of a Democratic House to carry out the professions of economy upon which we were elected. If it is, will you make this division of authority and responsibility as recommended by the majority?

Mr. Speaker, these are the teachings of history, and they are largely re-enforced by the lessons to be drawn from the nature of man. Man's mental organism is very like his physical. Take a dime and hold it up close enough to the natural eye and it will obscure almost, if not entirely, the whole of the universe. Remove that dime farther and farther from the eye and it appears in its more proper relations to other objects. Eventually, when you see it at a distance, you observe its insignificant proportions. Just so it is with our mental perceptions. Contemplate intently any one subject, fix your mental eye upon it, and it expands and increases in magnitude. Just in proportion as you study it intently it grows upon you.

There is not a chemist in the employment of the Government, especially if he be enthusiastic in his profession, as he ought to be in order to be of any value, who will not tell you, as I heard one of these gentlemen say in a lecture the other night, that the Government of the United States ought to spend more money on chemistry. There is not a geologist in the employment of the Government to-day who will not tell you that the Government ought to spend more money for geological purposes. There is not a geodetic specialist in the employ of the Government to-day who is not enthusiastic about the accuracy of his triangulations and his geodetic calculations and the beauty and grandeur of that science which, as he will tell you, measures the shape and size of the earth as it came forth fitted and fashioned from the hand of its Creator.

The same thing, Mr. Speaker, will be true of any gentleman on this floor who will study any single one of the departments of this Government. I was very much struck with a remark made yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. He had been for six years a member of the Post-Office Committee, and that committee, because he had diligently studied the subjects specially coming within its jurisdiction, seemed to him to be the most important of all the committees appointed by the Speaker. So it will be if any one of you will take up the business of the Committee on Patents and study that question; at the end of the Congress you will come out with yourself enthusiastic about the grandeur and beneficence of the great system that has grown up in the Patent Office under the fostering care of Government.

Now, there is not one of these great purposes for which we spend money that is not useful and beneficent. Take the Post-Office Department. It would be a great convenience if the letter-carrier every morning could knock at the door of every cabin in this land—in the depths of the forest, on the steep mountain side—and say to the inmates, "Here is your mail the Government has sent you." But we can not afford to spend the money necessary to expand our postal facilities to that extent. How far we shall go, what facilities we can afford, is a question of money.

So, too, we all admit we ought to have a better navy; we all admit we ought to have better seacoast defenses. It would be a matter of pride if we could boast we had ships afloat that could successfully contend upon the high seas with the combined navies of Europe. But we have not the money to build such a fleet as that just now. How far we shall go in that direction, how much of a navy we shall build, depends largely upon the question how much money we have at our command, how much can we afford when we take into consideration our financial condition and the other purposes for which we must spend money and the condition of our tax-payers.

The same thing might be said of our seacoast defenses. We would like to have guns mounted which would send a shot through the proudest ironclad afloat as if it were an egg-shell. We would like to have such guns placed so thickly along our seacoast, east and west, north and south, that not a single vessel in the world would dare to approach our most insignificant port. But we can not afford just now to build or purchase to that extent artillery for our fortifications. How far can we go? Is it not a question of money after all? Is not that the most important question? And can you divide that question into tidbits and decide by piecemeal how much you can give to the Navy, how much you can give to seacoast defenses, how much you can give to the Post-Office Department, and so on through the list? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it would be very unwise to attempt it.

But it has been urged here by such gentlemen as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and our friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that the argument against the disruption of the Appropriations Committee and the distribution of its business assumes the fact that no other than fifteen men in this House are capable enough, are honest enough, have information enough, to be trusted with appropriation bills. Is that argument a fair one? If it be a fair one, where would it not apply? Why, you could go back to the days when the Constitution was framed and say that when our ancestors provided for a single President they did it upon the idea that there could not be in the United States at the same time more than one man who could be trusted with Presidential power. Or you might say of the Congress which provided for nine judges of the Supreme Court that they so limited the number because only nine fit and competent judges could be found at the same time in the United States. Or you might say of all the forty-eight Congresses that have preceded us, embracing such men as Madison, Clay, John Quincy Adams, and so on down to Robert Toombs, whose bright spirit left us only yesterday, that all of these men supposed there were not more than fifteen men in the House at any one time who could be trusted with the appropriations for the Government, because they always confined that work to one committee. Was that the reason which actuated them? Ah! no; it was because it has always been the belief of all the good and wise men who have considered the question that there ought to be one committee, one body of men, whose duty it should be to study our financial situation, who should balance our books, and adjust in harmonious relations the expenditures to be made by the several Departments of the Government, subject always to the will of the House. It was because they believed that this was the only logical system; that it would be impossible otherwise to reconcile the claims of conflicting interests.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am taking up more of the time of the House than I intended, and I will in conclusion only allude to one more argument advanced in support of the report of the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] put forward yesterday in his forcible way this point. He says that the Committee on Appropriations, having so many bills to consider, divides them out to subcommittees, each subcommittee consisting of three members, and that each one of those subcommittees considers the bills intrusted to it, while the rest of the committee know little or nothing about it. "Then," said he, "will you submit to that? Ought we not to have more knowledge on the subject?" And he argues we will get more knowledge by distributing these bills as proposed in the report of the majority of the committee.

Let us see about that. I do not now see the gentleman from Maine in his seat. He was in one Congress upon the Judiciary Committee and in another Congress upon the Ways and Means Committee. If he were here, I would ask him or any other gentleman in this House familiar with the way in which business is transacted by our committees how business was conducted before the Judiciary Committee. If there was a bill for a new court in Texas, was not that bill referred to a subcommittee of three members of that Judiciary Committee, and did not that subcommittee of three, after it had made up its action on the subject, report it back to the whole committee, and did not the Judiciary Committee as a whole generally adopt its report? If there was a redistribution of judicial authority in the State of Iowa, was not that question referred to a subcommittee of three, and did not that subcommittee report to the whole committee, and did not the whole Committee on the Judiciary adopt that report?

And so it was with the Ways and Means Committee. The question as to whether or not the tariff should be increased or lowered on works of art was submitted, according to my recollection, to a subcommittee of three. I see before me the chairman of the Committee on Elections in the last House, and that suggests to me another illustration. He referred, as all other chairmen of committees did, separate bills to separate subcommittees. Now, whenever you make the distribution proposed by the report of the majority of the Committee on Rules you will have precisely the same thing over again complained of by the gentleman from Maine. The first act of a chairman of one of these eight or ten appropriation committees, when estimates were referred to him, would be to divide his committee into subcommittees. Every member of that committee would expect to be and would be put upon one or the other of these subcommittees, among whom the estimates referred to the committee would be distributed. We would then have, as now, three men and no more deciding originally on each item. And so it would be all the way through. You would not have, as the gentleman from Maine has contended, more knowledge, but you would merely have the same knowledge divided into more pieces. Your cloth would be cut into more fragments and you would have more tailors, but when you came into the House to sew up your garment only one tailor could work at a time in putting together the several pieces. And what would result from that?

As it is now, Mr. Speaker, nearly every member of the Appropriations Committee is expected at some time or other during the session to make an hour's speech in the House in explanation of the bill he is supporting before going into the Committee of the Whole. Now, if you divide the work at present done by this single committee of fifteen into seven committees consisting of some hundred men, instead of fifteen speeches in the House before going into the Committee of the Whole from members of the Appropriations Committee you will have a hundred speeches. The tendency will be for men who get a modicum of this knowledge, who have learned about one section of a bill, to state to the House all they know about it, and the consequence will be you will take five or six times as long to pass an appropriation bill in the future as in the past. For one, I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, we have the time to waste which would be wasted by a distribution of half the labors and authority of the present Appropriations Committee to six other committees.

How this body shall legislate is fast becoming a serious question. Our population is rapidly increasing, our business is rapidly extending, and the legislative wants are rapidly multiplying. At the same time the members of this House increase and our body becomes more unwieldy at every decade. One solution of the difficulty would be decentralization—remitting to the States more of the business of legislation. But that we may not look for now. What, then, are we to do? The only remedy seems to be to begin our sessions, say, in November or October, and when in session to speak less and legislate more. The tendency of this new proposition, it seems to me, is to block up the way with more speeches, and, consequently, to have less legislation. For this, also, I oppose it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated in the course of the discussion of the pending question by gentlemen on this side of the House that it would have been better for the members of the Committee on Rules representing it at the outset to have made some explanation of the reasons which induced them to unite in the majority report. If I forbore to make any explanation, sir, it was simply that I might supplement my reasons for my action by answering to some extent the objections which were urged against the report.

The report which has been submitted by the committee is radical in some of the changes it contemplates. It proposes to distribute certain of the appropriation bills to certain of the standing committees of the House. It proposes to eliminate entirely from appropriation bills all legislation. It proposes to abolish the Speaker's table, and it proposes an hour for the consideration of such questions as may be brought up for the consideration of the House by the different standing committees. In the remarks which I shall submit now I shall say but little in reference to the points to which I have alluded except the first.

We are confronted here by the opposition of gentlemen on the other side of the House, the majority of the House, who shrink from the adoption of our report because, as they frankly say, and as they believe, the party majority now in control is not to be trusted with the liberty which this amendment to the rules would give to it, and there are gentlemen on this side of the floor animated by the same reason to oppose these rules. They tell us that we, as the minority, can not afford to trust the majority of the House with the opportunities, which they point out in this amendment, to get at the public Treasury.

They tell us, Mr. Speaker, that you, possessed of all the capacity of which you are possessed, honest, as we all know that you are, that it is impossible for you to select from the majority of this House—the other side of it, from among the gentlemen who have elevated you to the position you occupy—committees that can keep within limits the expenditures of this Congress. They attempt to disguise this argument under the specious one that the committees when they are organized seek to aggrandize themselves by adding to their powers, and that hence they are not to be trusted; and this debate has drifted into a discussion of the river and harbor appropriation bill, which has been pointed to as a reason why no committee work in the shape of appropriations should be done by any other committee than the Committee on Appropriations or taken from that committee and distributed to the other standing committees. It does seem to me, sir, that the gentleman who made that argument was not ingenuous and did not deal frankly with the House. He knows—for he has been here longer than I have, and I know it—he knows that the Committee on Appropriations never had control of the river and harbor bill; and yet the argument was forced to our attention that at a certain period of time, when that committee lost jurisdiction of that subject, the appropriation for it increased in amount. Now, I say it never had jurisdiction of the subject in any practical sense. The rule has always been, so far as my memory goes——

Mr. HERBERT. Let me ask the gentleman from New York if he alludes to me?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir. The rule has always been, so far as my recollection extends, and so far as I have been able to look back into the history of legislative proceedings in this House, that first the Commerce Committee and then the Committee on Rivers and Harbors prepared that bill; I mean, sir, prepared it to be presented to the Committee on Appropriations. But when it was presented the records will show that in almost every single instance the motion was entertained to pass it under a suspension of the rules, and it passed and became a law, and the Appropriations Committee never took jurisdiction of it. Now, we have gained this in reference to that bill by removing this slight incumbrance or restriction imposed upon the Committee on Commerce and then upon the River and Harbor Committee. We have gained this, that since that committee has taken the absolute jurisdiction of it it has been usually brought in here and discussed at length, and if it had enormities in it there was an opportunity of pointing them out and disscussing them and the country was advised in reference to it, for it received ample consideration. The result has been that we have defeated—this House has defeated—practically two river and harbor appropriation bills. I call the attention of gentlemen to that fact. The bills have come in here and been discussed. They have not been forced through under suspension of the rules.

I might allude, sir, to another reason why the river and harbor bill is unlike any other one of the appropriation bills. It carries items that are to be expended in the districts of the different members of Congress. They are interested for large appropriations that are to be expended in their districts, and combinations may be made which will swell its volume and swell the aggregate amount. That, sir, is not true of any other appropriation bill which we propose to take from the Committee on Appropriations.

I say the gentleman was not ingenuous in another particular. He knows, as we all know, that the reason why this bill has been so swollen in its dimensions in the last few years is that the committee has taken jurisdiction of the improvement of the Mississippi River and of the rivers that empty into it. He favored that; the House favored it; and the result of it was a large increase in the volume of that bill. I say then, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the consideration of this argument, in my judgment, that should influence the action or the vote of any member of the House.

And now, Mr. Speaker, briefly, I proceed to examine precisely what we propose to do. As I said a little while ago, these bills which we propose to distribute do not carry appropriations for certain specified localities; the appropriations are to be spread over the whole United States. Most of them are to be expended under provisions of existing law.

I will take, if you please, the Post-Office bill, and I hope I shall not weary the attention of members as I discuss the question. My friend who last addressed the House upon this subject has been frightened lest we would attempt to build up new bureaus and provide for the expenditure of more money. If the gentleman would only take the trouble to examine the general appropriation bills that we propose to take from the Committee on Appropriations, he will discover that not one of them has any jurisdiction over those subjects whatever. All the bills that carry the appropriations for those objects this report of the majority of the Committee on Rules leaves with the Committee on Appropriations. Take the Post-Office bill. I find in it this item:

For mail depredations and post-office inspectors, including amounts necessary for fees for United States marshals and attorneys, $200,000.

Will gentlemen tell me there is danger of any committee enlarging that item beyond what it ought to be—that any man will consent to increase it for the purpose of enlarging his consequence as a committee man? It is for the general service. There is no job in it. It is not to be expended in his district. It is to be expended all over the United States by men who are strangers to him. It is to be expended under the supervision of the heads of the Departments. I read another item:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $5,150,000.

These are the clerks that are employed in the post-offices which are above the fourth class, for the distribution of letters and for attention to the public business generally. Will any gentleman in the investigation of this question tell me that any committee will attempt to increase that appropriation beyond what it ought to be? What motive, what incentive, what reason could he have for doing it? There is the great post-office in the city of New York, another in Boston, another in Chicago, one in each of the cities where the office is a Presidential office, and there the postmaster makes his estimates and sends his communication to the Postmaster-General indicating the number of clerks it is necessary for him to have in the transaction of his business, the amounts of money it is necessary for him to expend in managing the business of that office. Is there here any danger of any committee giving too much money for that branch of the service? It seems to me not, sir; and I ask gentlemen what committee is there more proper to dispose of that question, to give it a full, fair investigation and to examine the records in regard to it, than the Post-Office Committee, which shall be constituted.

I have called attention to a few items in the general Post-Office bill, and with the exception of those items over which a committee has no control, they are all of the same character. The Post-Office Committee will have the power to say how much money shall be expended for letter-carriers. Will they attempt to magnify themselves by appropriating more money than is necessary for that service? They have the right to say how many mail messengers shall be employed upon the railroads, or rather they have the right of appropriating the amount of money which shall be used in that branch of the service. Is there any danger of their enlarging the amount beyond the proper limits? If they do, sir, the expenditure of that money is under the control of the Postmaster-General and the different officers of that Department, and he, as a faithful, honest officer, is compelled to turn back into the Treasury all that is not required. You may take the carrying of the mails upon the railroads. We have general legislation which fixes the amount of money that can be expended. The compensation is determined by the weight, speed, and the space which is occupied by the mail matter, and the committee has no control over it whatever. You may take the salaries of the postmasters; these are all controlled by general law; all the salaries throughout the Departments are controlled by the general law, and no committee will have the power under these rules to change that law or to appropriate more money than is required for the different branches of the service.

So you might go through these different appropriation bills. Take, if you please, the consular and diplomatic bill, which it is proposed shall be sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Look at that bill. It contains no items for any establishment here in Washington; that matter is left with the Committee on Appropriations; but it provides for our ministers abroad, for the diplomatic and consular service. The salaries which are to be paid to the officers of that service are fixed by general statute, and under the rulings of the House, under the rulings of the Committee of the Whole into which the House resolved itself for the consideration of bills of this character, it has been held that no bill can carry a single item of appropriation for the establishment of a new consulate unless authority is contained in a previous act. I ask what committee is so fit as the Committee on Foreign Affairs, conversant with the needs of our consular service, conversant with our relations abroad, to frame a bill containing appropriations or recommendations in reference to the establishment of new consulates, and the abolishment of existing consulates, and the general regulation of the diplomatic service?

Why, sir, to nearly half the members present a scene must be perfectly fresh that occurred on this floor when that bill was presented in the last House. It came from the Committee on Appropriations stricken down in such a way that there was not a single member of the committee who did not know that inadequate appropriation for that service were recommended. I remember it well; and as I see gentlemen around me smile, I know that they remember it. Yet that bill came here upon the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations. A gentleman whom I saw here but a moment ago stood forth at that time as the special representative of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to contest the different items of appropriation which had been made by that bill.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield a moment, I desire to say that I recollect very well the bill to which he refers; but in one particular the gentleman's statement, if he will allow me to say so, is not accurate. There was a minority of the Committee on Appropriations that did not favor the bill as reported; and if the gentleman had done me the honor to listen while the bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole it occurs to me he would have ascertained that fact.

Mr. HISCOCK. I give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the full benefit of his statement, which I have no doubt is correct; and in so far as it differs from what I have said, I modify my statement accordingly. I will concede that he, and, if you please, the Republican members of the Committee on Appropriations, were opposed to that bill.

Now, why was that bill brought in here in that form? What reason could any committee give for having brought it here? The purpose was simply that gentlemen might stand before the House and play as economists.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentlemen allow me again?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's question is very apt and proper, and I think he has given the true reason. But he might go further and say that in the House of last session, in which the Democratic party had a majority of more than 80, the Democratic Committee of the Whole backed up the majority of their Committee on Appropriations; so that the bill became the act of the Democracy with their large majority as much as that of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am entirely willing the gentleman's remarks shall be interpolated into mine. Yet, sir, I am not here to-day to criticise the Democratic party. They have come into power. They hold this House. Certain gentlemen on this side have acted with certain gentlemen on the other side in formulating a code of amendments to the rules which, in my judgment, will correct certain abuses. Mr. Speaker, we have been met in entire fairness upon this question by action on the part of the majority of that committee (and "actions speak louder than words"), indicating that while they have no apologies for the past they do not desire the continuance of the vicious practice in the future. I united in that report for one, because I accepted those assurances in good faith, and because I believe that the amendments which we have reported will correct the evils of which the gentleman from Illinois complains.

Yes, sir, and he agrees with me that appropriation bills were reported here simply that men might pose as economists, that they might claim in their districts that they had endeavored to hold down the appropriations, but that a wantonly extravagant Congress had overruled them. There was not a single member of the Committee on Appropriations who, but for the fact he knew we would be here to-day to vote a deficiency, would have dared to present the bills I have mentioned to the House. The policy was false, unfair, and disingenuous; my friend from Illinois has indicated it, and I say these amendments which we propose to the rules promise fair dealing and frankness in reference to questions of that kind.

There is no reason, gentlemen of the other side, why you should indulge in that policy any longer. I do not know but you would do so if circumstances had not changed; but they have. You have the Administration. It is upon its estimates that you are to pass; it is for its service that you must provide, and I call attention to the fact that if you are now to starve an administration, it will be your Administration that will be starved and not ours.

I ask members to take up the bills to which I have referred and read them item by item, and point out a single item that is a suitable subject for "robbing the Treasury" or wantonly increasing appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, let us turn again to the Post-Office appropriation bill. We all remember what transpired upon this floor in connection with that bill; I have called your attention to it; I have referred to the items of that bill and stated what they contained. Yet the Committee on Appropriations brought in a report striking down that service. It did not provide for a sufficient number of mail-agents or mail-carriers; and I say the Committee on Appropriations knew that when they reported the bill.

And that bill was brought in here in order that gentlemen might again exhibit themselves in the attitude of economists. It was cheap talk on their part. It was the full height of statesmanship to which they could attain. Items would be reported here they knew were insufficient; and again I repeat, in reference to this bill, they never would have dared to pass it except that they knew another session of Congress might, by a deficiency bill, provide for the service which they had starved.

Sir, you may take up the Army bill, and it is made up of transportation and pay of the Army, over which this House has no control except by way of general legislation. The pay of the Army is fixed by statute. The transportation of the Army, the support of the Army is within the discretion of the Secretary of War or the commanding general, I do not remember which.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I guess they do not know themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. That supply has never been made to depend on the annual Army appropriation bill. Do gentlemen say it is within the power of a committee of Congress to rob the public Treasury by giving too many rations to the soldiers, to rob the public Treasury by giving too much clothing to the soldiers, or to rob the public on the item of transportation? It is not to be spent among their constituents. It is for the support of this great arm of the service, over which individual members or committees have no control.

We will take up next the Navy bill, and I repeat in reference to that all that I have said in regard to the others.

Gentlemen know, under our rulings, new ships can not be built except by new legislation. They have been ruled from our bills. It is the pay of the Navy, it is the maintenance of yards and docks away from the city of Washington—no jobs in them—nothing which interests an individual member for which appropriations are made; and I ask again, can not the Committee on Naval Affairs be trusted with that bill? Is there danger of their depleting the Treasury unduly? No, sir; they have no incentive to build up that branch of the service beyond its needs. All they appropriate in the main comes under the general provisions of the Revised Statutes for expenditure.

I do not mean to say they can not increase or diminish the amount, but I do mean to say that the money, when appropriated, is expended under law which fixes and controls the amount which should be disbursed.

Now we have taken these bills from the Committee on Appropriations, and we have given them to these several standing committees—why? Because, in our opinion, they could investigate these questions as well, as thoroughly, as exhaustively as the Committee on Appropriations. And we have arbitrarily, I will state, given to the Committee on Appropriations the bills which cover items of expenditure which might possibly be unduly enlarged. We have left to that committee the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Every bureau in the city of Washington is supplied and fed by it. I will say to my friend, if he still continues to put his trust in the Committee on Appropriations, we have left that bill precisely where he wants it to remain. All the clerkships, all the heads of bureaus are to be there provided for.

He has said the heads of these bureaus were here lobbying in behalf of the passage of this amendment of the rules. I say in reply that every single one of them, if he desires to have his bureau force or their salaries increased, must knock at the door of the old Committee on Appropriations.

Then take the sundry civil appropriation bill, a bill, sir, which carries all those items which are purely discretionary—which carries all those items in reference to which there is no existing law providing for the disbursement of money. I have been told in private discussion we had not carried out our reasoning to its legitimate result because we should have divided that bill up too and sent it to the other committees. Oh, no; we should not have divided it up. We have confidence in the Committee on Appropriations, and wherever there are these large discretions they are still left with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CASWELL. Does the gentleman intend to say these doubtful questions would be safer when left with the Committee on Appropriations than with the other committees?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman with all frankness. I believe you can constitute from the body of this House committees with whom those questions can be safely left. I believe you have the integrity and capacity to do it. I believe this body of three hundred and twenty-five men has in it yet enough of honesty to constitute all those committees. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen still ask why we left it there? I voted to leave it there in part for this reason, because I know there are members on this floor who do not agree with me in this good opinion of the House.

I, for one, voted to leave it there to answer their objections that I knew would be urged upon this floor. That is one of the reasons which prompted me in my action, and I doubt not that the same reason prompted other members of the Committee on Rules.

But, sir, we had another reason. We were in favor of the distribution of this work. This principle, to a certain extent, I believe, actuated every member of that Committee on Rules—I will not say every member, but nearly every member—that the responsibilities of legislation should be scattered in this House.

Mr. RANNEY (from his seat). Distributed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I used the word scattered; distributed the gentleman from Massachusetts, from Boston, says is better and I accept it. I, sir, am in favor for one of as many members of this House as possible sharing in its responsibilities, sharing in its labors, sharing in its honors, and sharing in its leadership. I, sir, am opposed, and I might as well say it here as elsewhere—I am opposed to this legislative body, as I would be to any legislative body of which I was a member, building up a system of rules that shall crown any man or set of men as kings of that deliberative body. [Applause.] No; we are here as equals, and I doubt if there is very much difference in our intellectual capacities. I doubt if there is very much difference in our aptitude for labor, and therefore it is that I have been in favor of distributing the work which is to come before the House. Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken from this Committee on Appropriations that work or that kind of work which I believe it can do well. I will say further to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] that I never would have joined in this report if I had believed that the Committee on Appropriations could do this work well. No, sir; never. I do not mean to say that it has been excessive in its appropriations, nor do I mean to say that it has been too parsimonious in its appropriations. I do not mean to say that so far as the work itself was concerned it has not been in the main well done. But what I mean to say is that it has not done it well for the country, well for the House, because it has not been well done for the other business which is brought to the House, and that is the ground of my present position on this report.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, who was chairman of this committee during the Congress before the last, whether he believes there is any difficulty which will prevent the Committee on Appropriations, consisting of fifteen men who are willing to work, from doing all the business that will come before that committee if you confine it to appropriations solely, divorcing from it all power to recommend legislation, and divorcing from every member of this House the power to move legislation upon the general money bills?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer the gentleman from Illinois categorically, but I propose to argue the question which he has submitted to me. Sir, the Committee on Appropriations of this House is made up, and it ought to be, of leading men—leading men before the country, leading members of the House, men of large experience, men who are looked to for the leadership of their party, men who are looked to to guard carefully the rights of the people and to criticise the legislation which may be proposed here, and to defeat or forward it. Strong leading men of the House usually have been made members of that committee. Now, sir, what I say is this: that you can not constitute the Committee on Appropriations of that class of men who can be able to bring in their bills here in season to procure their passage and still discharge the other duties that are expected of them by the House and the country. They are interested in other legislation. If it is a tariff bill that is up they must needs be here to watch it. If general legislation is here for consideration they are interested in it, as you and I are interested in it, and they must be here to further or defeat it. The result is if they discharge their duty to the country and to their constituents they have not the time to prepare these bills. Why, sir, there is no gentleman for whom I have a higher personal respect and regard, very few for whom I have more admiration, than the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] upon that committee. Will the gentleman from Indiana tell me if he can properly discharge his duty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to all of these bills and yet stand here as a guardian of the Treasury, occupying the position that is expected of him by the country? What is the result? What has been the result since I have been a member of the House, and since my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been here? The House knows what it has been; the country knows it. The Committee on Appropriations prepare their bills as other committees prepare their reports, and then the report of the Committee on Appropriations and the reports of the other committees all come in here at the same time, and the result is that the Committee on Appropriations takes the right of way, while, as a consequence, all other legislation is crowded out.

There is no chance for any deliberate discussion of another question. The committees have prepared their work and brought it in here. Work comes over here from the Senate. Senate bills are brought here. They accumulate during the last days of the session. It may be legislation in which a locality, or a State, or a section of the country may be deeply interested. When it comes here from the Senate some discussion of the question is desired. But it is within the last thirty days of the session, and you have to pass the appropriation bills or have an extra session. The result is that there is a denial of a hearing in this House for other bills.

I heard something said here yesterday on the floor in the course of this discussion with reference to the bankruptcy bill. It is not my purpose now to discuss that bill. But, sir, I say this, that the people who are in favor of that measure have a right to a hearing for it on this floor. They have a right to have it discussed here, and they have a right to have a vote upon it in this House; and yet, sir, by this manner and method of doing business which has prevailed here since the adoption of the present code of rules it could not have a hearing. This, too, while there is a majority of the House in favor of it. Why? Because it had to yield to the appropriation bills or else we were to have an extra session.

I believe, sir, if the appropriation bills are distributed in the way proposed we can go back to the old rule that has been cited in this report that every appropriation bill shall be reported to the House within thirty days after the appointment of the committees. If the report is adopted I will be in favor of that amendment to the rule so as to compel the committees within thirty days to bring in their bills for consideration and put them on their passage and get them out of the way of other legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. With pleasure.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether his experience as chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the Forty-seventh Congress has not taught him it is impossible to get these bills into this House, no matter where they come from or where they go to, within thirty days. We have not even the estimates on which to base the bills in thirty days. The rule to which the gentleman refers was a dead letter from the day it was enacted.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I would have the rule amended so as to say that the bills should be reported within thirty days after the estimates were presented. And I would say further, with reference to this question, that I do not believe there is a single one of these general appropriation bills that any intelligent committee thoroughly posted in reference to the service could not prepare and present to the House within one week after the committee has received the estimates.

Mr. RANDALL. That statement does not correspond with your record as the chairman of that committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am entirely willing that my record as chairman of that committee shall be paraded before the House. Certainly so far as the presentation of the bills was concerned it will more than favorably compare with the record of any other committee before or since for ten years.

Mr. RANDALL. I think not.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I think he had better content himself with remaining in the fields of speculation and thought on that question.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to stand by the record.

Mr. HISCOCK. Take my own experience with reference to those bills. I had the power; I grant it. And when I had it I did not bring in those bills early; I grant that. I could have done so if I had desired. But what did I do? I held back the legislative and sundry civil bills until away in July to force this House to pass the little internal-revenue bill and to pass the Tariff Commission bill.

Mr. RANDALL. There was a little log-rolling.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORRISON. Who log-rolled with you?

Mr. HISCOCK. I did it on the ground I have stated, and I say if you will examine the RECORD you will find that on the floor of the House I distinctly proclaimed my intention and policy to the country. My action was not covert. It was taken boldly and manfully. Whether I ought to have had that power or not, perhaps, sir, is questionable. Since I had it I chose to exercise it. And I believe in that particular case it was wisely exercised.

But, sir, what I say in reference to this matter is this, and the record proves it, that nearly all the appropriation bills have passed this House within thirty days before Congress adjourned. I say the record shows an aggregate amount of $275,000,000 has passed the House within thirty days of the final adjournment, and has been dumped—I use the word advisedly, having relation both to the method and quality of the material deposited—has been dumped into the Senate for its examination in that late period of the session. I ask gentlemen upon this side, yes, and upon the other side of the House if this is a good and wise method of legislation? Should the Senate be compelled to consider the appropriation of this vast amount of money within thirty days of the expiration of the session? Why, sir, it is often the case—it is no exception to the rule—that within the last week of the session $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 have gone over to the Senate for consideration with the other appropriation bills still there undisposed of. Is this a proper system? Are we afraid to adopt a method that will not subject us to those evils? The gentleman from Illinois said he took the responsibility of his vote, and that he desired not to influence anybody else. I say for myself, on this question, I am willing to take the responsibility of my vote and go to the country on it.

Many new members are sitting around me, and I ask them to appeal to the old members for verification of the facts I will now state. Six, seven, eight, nine, ten millions of dollars are disposed of by committees of conference, and no member of the House—perhaps I ought to except the conferees, yet I hardly think I ought—no member of the House knowing precisely what disposition is made of the money.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman propose a scheme which will better that or will hasten the business of this House?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do. I believe if you will give to the Post-Office Committee the Post-Office appropriation bill, which embraces only such questions as those to which I have called attention, that within one week after the estimates are presented here that committee can report its bill. More than that, I believe if it is a fair bill, instead of there being speeches upon the question, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, there will be no speech upon the bill, but it will pass by unanimous consent.

Why, sir (and this remark does not apply to the gentleman from Illinois), I must say that many a time I have thought these bills had been constituted for the very purpose of promoting discussion on this floor; that this was the objective point of the men who prepared them—that they might come here to enter the lists as debaters and demolish all the gentlemen who sought to assail their bills. I believe that discussion is prolonged by these bills being presented here in this way; and I say to you, gentlemen upon the other side, that you should have no fear—you, Mr. Speaker, as we know, have no fear—of these amendments, because it is the estimates of your President that are to pass under review.

I wish to say a little more with reference to one of the evils that have grown out of this system. Twenty-five, fifty, seventy-five, one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars tied up in conference in different bills! And to what a spectacle was the country and the House invited! The Committee on Appropriations through its conferees dickering, not with reference to items in the particular bill, but with reference to items in different bills, trading off the provisions in one bill for the provisions in another. I have made this charge, Mr. Speaker, with great boldness, and I pause for any member of the last Committee on Appropriations to dispute my assertion.

Mr. CANNON. I will say very frankly to the gentleman that while I was never the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, he was; and I had the honor to be upon that committee. If such "trading" as he refers to took place in that committee then it was known to the gentleman and not to me. And so far as I am concerned, if such "trading" took place in any Committee on Appropriations it did not come to my knowledge or meet my approval.

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe, Mr. Speaker, all that the gentleman says. It did not come to his knowledge when he and I served together; and it would never have come to his knowledge if we had served together for many Congresses more.

But, sir, under this system there is a chance for that sort of thing; and I will vote to abolish any system which admits in practice such vicious legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope some gentleman will yield me his time or ask an extension of mine.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will not occupy a great while longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HISCOCK. Again, Mr. Speaker, what is the result of this system? For the correctness of your appropriation bills as passed—nearly every one of them—you are dependent upon the integrity of two clerks of Congress. I undertake to say (and I will pause to be contradicted on this point) that the Committee on Enrolled Bills has never been able to read the appropriation bills after they were engrossed. In this particular you are compelled to depend upon the integrity and capacity of two clerks, overwearied with night service, extending frequently into the early, or, if you please, the late, hours of the morning—yes, Mr. Speaker, when the hand has been turned back upon the dial to prolong the session. You are compelled to depend upon the physical strength, the integrity, and the capacity of these men.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the hand was turned back on the dial to lengthen the session?

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, I will withdraw that remark, and if permitted I would be glad to have it left out of the RECORD, because I do not care to enter into an investigation of that question.

Mr. CANNON. I wanted to see what committee was responsible or that, and whether we could not break up that system.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will not enter into a discussion of that question. But, sir, the legislation of this Congress is relegated to these clerks who make up and engross these bills; and, as I said a moment ago, no committee of the House knows what provisions are in them. The conferees themselves who have charge of the bills do not know what is contained in them. I have seen it stated somewhere in the newspapers in reference to the closing hours of the last session that an item for the armament of new cruisers was left out through an oversight of the engrossing clerk. My friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], who is a newspaper man, will perhaps corroborate my statement on this question. This House spoke in emphatic terms in reference to making an appropriation for the armament of these new cruisers. The Secretary told us that we needed to start the building of these guns before we commenced building the ships. The Committee on Appropriations resisted that provision. Still I think the House put it in. If it did not put it in there was a decisive vote on that question, and, as one of the newspapers said—I do not know whether truthfully or not—the conferees reported in favor of that item going into the bill. Yet it was left out. And the Secretary of the Navy —not our Secretary of the Navy; ours, speaking as an American citizen; but not ours speaking as a party man—has sent in here the report of his Department, saying, in purport, there was no need of so early an appropriation for those ships, since no appropriation was made for their armament, as it takes a much longer period of time to prepare the armament of vessels than to build them.

And this is the kind of legislation, Mr. Speaker, dealing with millions—amounts so large the brain grows dizzy as it contemplates them—this is the species of legislation, I say, to which I am opposed and against which we have attempted to provide a remedy.

I come, now, to consider one further point in this discussion. Just think of it, Mr. Speaker, $275,000,000 of appropriation bills, under this system, are passed through Congress and laid before the President of the United States, demanding his approval, when he is not able to read one word or one line of them. I believe that this great country would respond to a veto from the Executive if he said, I will not sign a bill that comes to me at such a questionable time.

Look at it, sir. I will recall to your mind the scenes you have witnessed, Mr. Speaker, in the closing hours of a session of Congress—not the closing days, but the closing hours of a session. The President with his Cabinet, and all the legislation of this House, incuding all the bills of the Committee on Appropriations, at 1, 2, and 4 o'clock in the morning, all placed before the President of the United States, and the alternative presented to him to sign the bills or to be forced to call an extra session. He, sir, is a part of the law-making power of this country, and I believe that, under the Constitution, he should have ample time for the consideration of all bills. We, in the State of New York, give, I believe, our governor thirty days after the Legislature has adjourned for the examination of bills. Not an hour is given under our Constitution, and, more than all that, Congress so manages its business as absolutely to force the signature of the President to bills under such circumstances that he can not know what provisions they contain.

Mr. Speaker, I notice that the minority report here states that what is proposed is unusual. I do not know, but it says that it is unheard-of in legislative bodies. Sir, I think somewhere in the report we are pointed to the mother country to be guided by her experience on the question. I am willing to be guided by the practice of England on this question. What does she do? The committee on supply is the committee of the whole house, and it takes up the budget and approves or rejects the items in it. If you please, the standing committees that I have referred to may formulate the budget for administering the Government and bring it to us with their views, with the result of their investigations, and we can adopt or reject the items as they are presented to us.

We have been told that eminent men in the past have given the sanction of their approval to this system. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has quoted their sayings in his report. I wish he would have been willing to have followed them in some of the other doctrines they have preached, as it would have been more profitable to the country than simply to quote their sayings here now in this manner.

It to me is always a little questionable for an individual to invoke the testimony of his opponents on a great question. We do not know the surroundings or political exigencies of the case, if you please, which may have induced men to make their arguments in reference to a certain theory or policy. I can understand there might be circumstances where I might think it wise policy to lodge the legislation of the House in some ten or fifteen members, but in these times of peace, when there are no questions before the people but those of finance, I do not recognize this as any such occasion.

I might say further in reference to the statements of these gentlemen who have been quoted that all men grasp for power and leadership, and that there are but few men who have been willing to add their voice to arguments in favor of their own deposition. Great parliamentary leaders often conclude those who surround them need their guardianship; that it is unsafe to trust them with the depositing of their own votes. Now, if that has been so in times past, let us start out in a new era and educate every man to the responsibility of voting and acting for himself.

I have no fault to find with the statesmanship or high character of the distinguished gentlemen who have been referred to. They have been the great leaders of the party to which I belong. I believe I was present when some of the utterances which have been referred to were made. Presidential candidates were then before the country. I do not question the good faith or the earnestness of the men who made those statements. Self-interest, perhaps, dictated they should be aggrandized as leaders of the Republican party.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are not a triumphant party to-day, and we do not need to invest anybody on this side of the House with extraordinary powers of leadership. And in the interest of good legislation for this country I do not believe it is worth while, since you have the President, since you have the Administration and must pass on its estimates, you should force leadership on any particular individual or any particular committee on your side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have but little more to say in the discussion of this question. I have not touched any of the other amendments which have been proposed by the committee. This one in reference to eliminating legislation from the general appropriation bills I must, however, say a word in reference to. We have passed the period in the history of this country in which I am afraid of riders upon appropriation bills.

I see coming up in the distance no great political question that it may be necessary to solve in that manner, and I am frank to say that if that had been the only danger that confronted me I should be indifferent as to whether that amendment of the committee prevailed or not. But, sir, it has a far greater range, a more far-reaching effect upon the legislation of this House than that.

Again, to answer the objections made by gentlemen on both sides of the House that this House can not be trusted with itself, we propose that no committee shall have the power of putting any legislation upon its appropriation bills. How can you increase your appropriation bills, when they are made under existing law, to any great amount if you can not carry with the proposed appropriation the legislation which authorizes the expenditure of the money?

That, sir, is the great reason for that amendment to the rule. You take, for instance, the Committee on Naval Affairs. The country, we will say, expects a new navy; but that committee can not bring in an appropriation here for this new navy upon the same bill which provides for it. The legislation must first pass the House, then the Senate, and be approved by the President, and the great object of that provision of the rules is as a limitation upon the powers of the committees themselves.

I think, sir, I have said all I desire to say. We have divided these labors; we have given to the Committee on Appropriations all the labor which it can perform for the benefit of the public service. There is not a single man on this floor who hears me but who knows the fact which I state. We have not intended to say that its work has not been well done in the past. We cast no reflections upon the committee; but we do say you are overwhelmed with work, you are overloaded, and these other standing committees can do the work as well and as economically as you can.

Now, sir, not precisely in the same language as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I say in conclusion that I have given the reasons that influenced my vote upon this question in committee, and, for one, I desire to influence no other member upon this floor, but I shall cast my vote in the House in accordance with the views which I have expressed, and am willing to take the responsibility. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, while I am not hopeful that any of the amendments proposed to the rules in this report of the committee will be found beneficial or facilitate the business of the House, I am inclined for one to acquiesce in all of the amendments suggested with two exceptions. I indulge no hope that the business of the House will be promoted by the additional morning hour proposed, or that it will secure better legislation. I hope I am mistaken in that. Still, I repeat, I indulge no such hope. But the temper of the House is manifest. A change of the rules is demanded in the belief that the present system obstructs legislation. A belief is widespread that under the present rules of the House minorities have improper power, and that bills that would receive the approval of a majority of the House, measures of beneficial legislation, are defeated by the simple operation of the rules of the House. I believe this is a misapprehension, but that misapprehension will not be apparent until the new rules shall have been applied. I think it will finally be conceded that it is the vast body of measures that accumulate in the House, growing greater every year, and not the rules, that obstruct legislation, if, indeed, it is improperly obstructed.

The two propositions in the report of the Committee on Rules to which I take exception are, and I name them in their order of importance, according to my judgment, the change in the third clause of the twenty-first rule of the House, relating to legislation in the interest of economy, and the change in the eleventh rule of the House, touching the consideration of appropriation bills, I shall confine what I wish to say to these two propositions alone.

I listened with great pleasure last evening to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] when he addressed the House on this subject. I always listen with pleasure to that gentleman; he always speaks well. I thought I had misapprehended his remarks as to the old retrenchment rule of the House, and therefore I have had recourse to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I find that the gentleman made use of the following words; he is always vigorous in his language:

Yet, Mr. Speaker, then and there was opened the Pandora's box, which through the succeeding ten years was to do "great harm to the country."

Then was opened the "Pandora's box!" What evil to the country was it that justified this elegant allusion to the classics? Why, it is the rule adopted by the Forty-fourth Congress, a rule for which this side of the House, when in the minority for years and years, had struggled, a rule which had received at an earlier period the support of some of the most experienced members on the other side of the House.

Nor shall any provision in any such bill—

or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The whole rule is as follows:

RULE XXI.

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

That rule my friend from Illinois regards as the source of all our troubles for the last ten years—a mischievous rule. All of the evils incident to legislation were turned loose upon us and the country by that unhappy provision. The presumption would naturally arise, from what the gentleman from Illinois said, that prior to that time there had been no legislation upon appropriation bills, and during the long period of time that the gentleman and his associates upon the other side of the House had control legislation it had been carefully kept off of appropriation bills, and this rule of the Forty-fourth Congress changed the whole order of things. Now, what are the facts? I do not need to go into the details of this question. I think I am justified in saying that but few appropriation bills were passed for years before the Forty-fourth Congress that did not contain independent legislation, but I call attention to a striking instance with which the gentleman from Illinois is familiar. I refer to the sundry civil appropriation bill, passed on the 10th of June, 1872, which contained page after page of legislation on the subject of Federal supervisors of election and of various provisions of law connected with that subject.

But I point to an instance preceding the time of the adoption of the rule of the Forty-fourth Congress so denounced which will show very clearly what was the practice prior to the Forty-fourth Congress under the rule now proposed to be readopted.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to make a suggestion without interrupting his argument?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. My suggestion is this, and it is in reference to what was stated by the gentleman from Indiana: In a former session of Congress, when a question was up about general legislation upon appropriation bills, I had occasion to go to the statutes and look through the twelve years that the Republicans controlled both Houses of Congress, and I had printed in a speech of mine a table that showed three hundred and eighty and odd different cases of general legislation on appropriation bills in the time that Congress was controlled by the Republican party.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am obliged to my friend for making my statement more specific. I find scarcely an appropriation bill in those former years where independent legislation does not appear. But I will call the attention of the House to the event in Congress which especially impressed on this side of the House the necessity of the rule which is the subject of this denunciation. I ask the Clerk to read from the Congressional Globe the passage I have marked, that the House may see what the rule was prior to the adoption of the rule which, in the opinion of the gentleman, opened the Pandora box from which so many evils have sprung to harrass this House and the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Proceedings of the House, January 8, 1873.]

For compensation of the President of the United States, $25,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out $25,000 and inserting $50,000; also by adding to the paragraph the following proviso:

"Provided, That from and after the 4th March, 1873, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $50,000 per annum, payable monthly."

The salary which the President of the United States receives was fixed——

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve the point of order upon this amendment before the gentleman proceeds.

Mr. SARGENT. Then we had better settle the point of order now.

Mr. HOLMAN. The law fixes the salary at $25,000 a year, and has done so for more than seventy-five years.

Mr. SARGENT. That I concede; but the rule of the House allows salaries to be increased.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am perfectly willing to reserve my point of order on this amendment and allow the gentleman to be heard.

Mr. SARGENT. The point of order having been raised, I would like to have it decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will state his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is that there is no law authorizing this increase of salary. The law, as it now exists, fixes the salary of the President of the United States at $25,000 a year. This amendment proposes a change of the law. If there is any doubt about that I will read the law fixing the salary.

Mr. SARGENT. I admit that the law fixes the salary at $25,000 a year, and it can not be changed for this term and a higher salary can not be paid for any future term unless the law is changed. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 120 and the practice under that rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to interrupt the reading for a moment to call the attention of the House to the fact that the rule as now to be read is exactly the rule word for word proposed to be adopted by the report of the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule and the practice under it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."—Rule 120. [It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes an existing law. But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the uniform practice to have been that under this rule amendments increasing salaries are in order, though the Chair confesses he does not understand the reason of the practice. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The events that followed that action changed the political complexion of this House. The public indignation at the legislation based upon that ruling, and following it, gave at the next election the Democrats instead of a small minority in the House an overwhelming majority. That unquestionably resulted from the legislation predicated on that ruling, which included the increase not only of the salary of the President but of the Federal judges, the salaries of members of Congress, with the increased salary covering the preceding two years, the heads of Departments, and a vast body of other officers of the Government, involving a large expenditure beyond any previous example in official salaries. The effect on the public judgment was clearly seen in the election of 1874—I think more clearly than it has ever been expressed except in a few instances on a question of public policy.

The Democratic side of the House as soon as the Forty-fourth Congress was organized brought forward and adopted this rule of retrenchment. What have been the fruits of it all through these years? What has occurred to justify its repeal? I have shown some of the fruits of the system under the rule as it formerly existed. What have been the fruits of the new rule of the Forty-fourth Congress? In the very first Congress in which that rule was adopted, and adopted by a unanimous vote on this side of the House for it, comparing the appropriations in that Congress under the then new rule and the appropriations in the Congress immediately preceding under the old rule, the one allowing amendments to increase expenditure, the other only allowing amendments to reduce expenditures, there is a difference of $63,926,423.18—over $63,000,000. Over $30,000,000 a year were saved to the labor of the country. Such was the rule now so roundly denounced. That economy is perhaps one of those evils in the view of my friend that escaped from this Pandora box—this new rule of the House formed in the interest of economical government.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a single moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman has referred to the proposed rule as reported by the committee as enabling the House to increase salaries and has referred to a certain decision under the rule, and states that the proposed rule of the committee is identical with the one under which the decision he has referred to was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is my understanding.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read about half a column of proceedings which occurred after what the gentleman has read, showing that the decision——

Mr. HOLMAN. Wait a moment.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman hear me? Showing that the decision of the Chair was reversed by the committee then and there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. But the gentleman ought not to consume my time in an explanation. The explanation makes the case much stronger than I put it.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman allow that to be read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will state what it is; and the gentleman knows what my statement will be. I appealed from that decision. Although the ruling was sustained by uniform precedent I regarded the construction that had been placed upon the rule in the interest of extravagant government as absolutely indefensible, and although no gentleman ever occupied the chair for whose judgment in general I had a higher respect than Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, who made the decision, I appealed from that decision; and strangely enough, in view of subsequent events, the House sustained the appeal and overruled the Chair. Every gentleman knows the subsequent history of the measure. When the proposition embraced not only the President's salary but a multitude of other salaries the ruling was sustained.

A MEMBER. Who was the Speaker then?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, was the presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole when the decision was made; so when a great body of the officers of the Government, legislative, executive, and judicial were embraced in the proposed increase of salaries, then upon the same point of order and a similar decision the appeal was defeated, and this measure of extraordinary legislation on an appropriation bill became the law on the 3d day of March, 1873, and you all know the result. The people condemned the measure, and the rule now sought to be abrogated became the rule of the House. I think my friend should not have required me to go into these details, because they do not affect the point before the House.

Mr. BURROWS. I simply ask to have read that portion of the proceedings.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be read. I intended that a friend should have a portion of my time, and that is the only objection I had to the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). The Clerk will read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the extract being printed in the RECORD. I trust that will be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the extract sent to the desk by the gentleman from Michigan will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The extract referred to by Mr. BURROWS, from the proceedings of the House of Representatives of January 8, 1873, is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the uniform practice to have been that under this rule amendments increasing salaries are in order, though the Chair confesses he does not understand the reason of that practice. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I very respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, on the ground that the rule is rendered utterly nugatory if the salaries can be increased beyond those fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the uniform practice to be in conformity with his decision.

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. Does the decision of the Chair reach the proviso offered as an amendment?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; it is meant to reach that. Where the law fixes a salary, even if you appropriate a greater amount, it is held by the Treasury Department that the greater amount can not be paid unless the law is changed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. While we may increase a salary to be paid for the year for which the appropriation is made, can we provide in an appropriation bill that two years hence, or ten years hence, the salary shall be so and so? That is the point I would suggest.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment has been proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. SARGENT]. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] raises the point of order that the amendment is not in order because it changes existing law. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the gentleman from Indiana appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment to change the amount appropriated for the fiscal year, with the proviso that the increased amount shall continue to be the salary of the President of the United States. Under the uniform ruling, both in the House and in the Committee of the Whole, the Chair overrules the point of order. An appeal being taken, the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 22, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was not sustained.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the amendment without the proviso, and proposing simply to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$50,000;" so that the clause will read:

"For compensation of the President of the United States, $50,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the gentleman can not offer an amendment in the exact words of a proposition which has been already submitted and ruled out of order by the committee. The gentleman uses the exact words of his former amendment, merely leaving out the proviso.

Mr. SARGENT. To sustain the point of order just raised by the gentleman from Indiana would not be more absurd than the action of the Committee of the Whole a few moments ago, because the committee have overruled what has been the uniform practice of the House and of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the further point of order that in spite of the ruling, which has been clearly erroneous, this amendment does change an existing law.

Mr. SARGENT. I raise the point of order that somebody else than the gentleman from Indiana has a right to speak sometimes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point is that this amendment does in fact change an existing law, and is in violation of the rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take an appeal from the decision. I do not believe the precedents are uniform or at all reliable. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 50, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SARGENT and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 67.

So the decision of the Chair was not sustained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume it is only necessary to refresh the memory of gentlemen in reference to these matters. The rule, as I have said, framed to increase salaries, notwithstanding this action of the Committee of the Whole, when this entire measure of salary increase was consolidated, finally triumphed and became the law. You all remember how promptly it was repealed as far as it could be.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me, as he has referred to me in this connection——

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I hold in my hand and desire to read a statement in reply to the claim of enormous reduction——

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer a question.

Mr. CANNON. I wanted to correct the gentleman on a statement of fact; that was all.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I am not mistaken as to my facts. I have examined them over and over again. My friend must not misapprehend me. He thinks I have not embraced in my statement the $25,000,000 not appropriated for the Army in the last session of that Forty-fourth Congress; but I include every dollar of it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the gentleman is still mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. You refer to deficiencies.

Mr. CANNON. No, sir; I refer to an official statement of the expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, I understand all that; I can not consent that shall go into my speech. I have seen that campaign document. I have spoken by the public records; they will confirm the correctness of my statements. My friend ought not to insist upon my allowing a mere political campaign document to go into the RECORD.

Again, Mr. Speaker, take the last session of Congress. Let us see how this Pandora's box of a rule has affected the public interest. You had in the last Congress a very excellent Committee on Invalid Pensions; and one of my colleagues [Mr. MATSON], a very excellent gentleman, well informed as to the duties of that committee, was the chairman. Yet it was only in connection with the appropriations that it appeared you were expending a larger sum of money in connection with your medical boards than the public interests required. So on the last pension appropriation bill there was adopted an amendment, which received the approval of every member of the House and every member of the Senate, so far as I am informed, and is now approved, I think, by the Pension Bureau—at least I am not aware that it has been the subject of a word of objection—reducing the expenditures on that single item—I state it carefully—at least $150,000 per annum. I could go on and enumerate in detail a great multitude of similar instances in your legislation during the last ten years. Whenever that rule has been justly applied the results have been beneficial; in no instance has it injured the public service, and it has annually saved millions to the people.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is not that an argument in favor of allowing the Committee on Pensions to have charge of that branch of our appropriation bills?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that—none whatever. It is a bill that stands out without connection with the other appropriation bills except as to salaries.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a question.

Mr. KING. I understood the gentleman to state that this Pandora's box was opened by the interpretation given to the rule by the then Speaker.

Mr. HOLMAN. The interpretation of the Chair to which I have referred was prior to the adoption of the rule under discussion by the Forty-fourth Congress and while the rule now proposed to be readopted by the report of the Committee on Rules was in operation.

Mr. KING. Then I understand the gentleman to state that all these evils grew out of the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I cannot say that was the fact. They grew out of the rule, for the rule was held to have been adopted for the express purpose of allowing an increase of salaries on appropriation bills. The Chairman simply followed the uniform precedent.

What I mean to say, Mr. Speaker, is that that ruling was in conformity with the uniform ruling previously made, when it was held that the words of this proposed rule now before the House, "and for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government," were placed in the rule as far back as 1836 for the express purpose of promoting legislation on appropriation bills to increase salaries.

Mr. KING. But I understand an appeal was taken and the decision of the House was reversed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. KING. Then how could these evils have grown up?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have stated that subsequently the decision was sustained, and the provisions increasing the salaries became the law.

It is said this rule of the House is in conflict with that of the Senate, and this body is put at disadvantage; that the rules of the two bodies should in some degree be in harmony; that the appropriation bills should contain no legislation, but simply consist of appropriations to carry on the Government under the estimates.

Let me call attention to the last Post-Office appropriation bill. There is an item of $400,000 (one-half of the $800,000 named) contained in that appropriation bill, in a provision which had been defeated in the House, a measure of new legislation paying steamship corporations 50 cents per mile for transportation of your mails without any reference whatever to the amount of mail to be transported. That independent legislation was put on the bill in the Senate, came to the House, and after a long and exciting contest became the law. While the Senate year after year has been putting legislative provisions on appropriation bills, as I think, in the interest of lavish expenditure, it can be said to the credit of the House that, whatever may have been the character of your other legislation, it at least under the operation of this rule has uniformly retrenched expenditures of the Government. Let me say in all candor that large as were the appropriations of the last Congress, many millions in my judgment beyond the wants of the public service, they would have been far greater had it not been for the restrictive power of this rule which it is now proposed to repeal.

I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who discussed this subject with his usual ability, to express the opinion that the Committee on Appropriations, or committees, should take the estimates and appropriate accordingly. He suggested at least to this side of the House that confidence should be reposed by it in the men now at the heads of your great Departments and bureaus. I am glad to believe that the men on this side of the House will apply the same rigid rule to the expenditures of the Government estimated for by the Departments that they would apply if, instead of their own party, the opposition controlled the Government. I am sure the gentlemen at the head of your great Departments will ask the aid of Congress in behalf of frugal government. President Jefferson, a very high authority among Democrats, in speaking of the duty of Congress to guard against the natural tendency of the Executive Departments of the Government toward extravagance, in one of his earlier messages used the following language:

> Considering the general tendency to multiply offices and dependencies and to increase expense to the ultimate term of burden which the citizens can bear, it behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion which presents itself for taking off surcharge; that it never may be seen here that, after leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings on which it can subsist, Government shall itself consume the residue of what it was instituted to guard.
> In our care, too, of the public contributions intrusted to our direction it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money, and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money, where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.

Yet my friend from New York would have your Committee on Appropriations simply appropriate the sums estimated, on the plausible argument that, with Democrats at the heads of your Departments, whatever appropriations were made and not required for administering the Government would be returned to the Treasury. This is not a democratic view. No, the duty of the legislative department of the Government is to see to it that not one dollar beyond the wants of the public service shall be withdrawn from the Treasury, or authorized to be withdrawn. Whoever may be at the head of your great Departments, the people expect in the interest of honest government that Congress shall faithfully perform that duty.

This rule which authorizes legislative retrenchment on appropriation bills has been in operation for ten years. Every retrenchment effected up to this time in these ten years has resulted from the operation of that rule. It is now proposed to reverse that rule. You have that issue, gentlemen, squarely before you. It is proposed, instead of a rule permitting legislation on appropriation bills in the interest of economy, you shall have a rule which, by the old and uniform interpretation at least, will be exclusively employed in the increase of salaries. The latter was the rule of the Republican party, the former of the Democratic party. You will decide, gentlemen, which shall be the rule of this House.

You have the two measures before you, gentlemen, for selection; the rule that saves the public service from extravagance, the rule that in one Congressional term saved over $63,000,000 to the people of this country, the rule under which every reform that has been made in the last ten years has been accomplished, that has stood up a strong barrier against extravagance in Government, and the rule reported by the Committee on Rules, the uniform interpretation of which, especially the words printed in italics in the report, is that it was framed for the purpose of promoting legislation upon appropriation bills for the increase of salaries.

I hope that all that is necessary is to call the attention of this side of the House to the difference between these measures to secure a continuance of the wise and safe rule now in force; for I know that a party pledged as the Democratic party is, and has been throughout all its past history, to frugal, honest government, will be loath to see reinstated a rule repudiated by a Democratic House ten years ago, when that party after years of defeat obtained the control of this House, and a rule expressing economy and reform repealed. I hope you will not decide, gentlemen, that this barrier against extravagance shall be stricken down. It would be a melancholy spectacle, Mr. Speaker, it would be a sad hour for the people of this country, if, after a quarter of a century, this great party, as soon as it acquires control of public affairs, should strike down the barrier of its safety, especially if stricken down in the legislative department which is specially charged with maintaining the purity and honor of the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, I come for a few moments to the other proposition. I put it last, gentlemen, for I do not attach as much importance to the question of who or what committees shall frame your appropriation bills as I do to a rule under which the frugality of this Government can be maintained and enforced, no matter what is done by committees. And yet I am fearful that the result of the change of the rules, if you determine it shall be brought about, touching the consideration of your appropriation bills, will be entirely different from that which is so fondly hoped for. I am well aware that none of you gentlemen would vote to distribute the appropriation bills, determine that they shall be considered in fragments, and that the number of committees responsible for their consideration should be increased, unless you believed that the public interests would be subserved.

The river and harbor bill may well be, I think, under the charge of a separate committee. It is a bill standing out by itself. It is solitary and alone. It stands upon the same basis exactly as the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department. Either of these bills, important as they are, embracing a single subject with many items, could be placed under the control of any of the committees of the House. Indeed I never have known the time when the Committee on Commerce, on which I had the honor to serve for some six years, or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors more recently, had not the main work of forming the river and harbor bill, a bill of many items, requiring much study, and which was, I think, very properly given in charge of a committee having no other duties. The question of economy could alone be considered here. It is a bill full of difficulties and stands by itself.

The Appropriations Committee in former years often reported the bill, it is true, but simply for the reason that under the former rules of the House the Committee on Commerce had not the right to report at any time, and hence the report was made to the Committee on Appropriations and through that committee to the House for consideration. I think the Committee on Commerce should have had control of it from the first. I can say very nearly the same with reference to the bill making appropriations for fortifications. That has no connection with the other bills. That is a separate and distinct measure, standing alone like those to which I have referred. The question of economy alone arises here. I think I understand the motives which induced the leaving of that bill with the Appropriations Committee. But that bill, as to the framework of the measure, might be considered very well by a separate committee of the House. The same is also true of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. The bill touching the District of Columbia is a separate and distinct bill, carved out, so to speak, separated from the balance of your budget, and if it was apparent that it would result in the economical administration of the affairs of the District that bill ought to be considered by the committee having charge of legislation for the District of Columbia, except so far as it is found to be unwise policy to invest a committee with general legislative power on the one hand and the power to appropriate on the other. This has been fully discussed.

But, sir, we have three bills, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the sundry civil bill, and the bill providing for deficiencies. If you leave these bills in the hands of your Committee on Appropriations and send the other great bills to the other committees, I shall indulge the hope, gentlemen, at least, then, that such a system of adjusting your large appropriations will not work grave public injury. But I am apprehensive that it will. Do you remember, gentlemen, that the bill known as the sundry civil appropriation bill now appropriates from twenty-five to twenty-seven million dollars annually, is, after all, but a part of the other great appropriation bills? You had no such bill, I think, until 1857. It grew out of the occasional mistakes in passing bills through the House and Senate, and conference committees, mistakes in many instances of omissions, by accident, at the last moment discovered. As late as 1864 that bill was laid on the table without the public interest suffering a particle and without the necessity of afterward appropriating a single item contained in the bill. But it has grown enormously. It now embraces provisions belonging in greater or less degree to all the other great bills except the bill under the control of the River and Harbor Committee.

Heretofore it contained a part of those appropriations. They were stricken out at the last session for the purpose of being provided for by the river and harbor bill. The river and harbor bill failed, so that your appropriations for the Mississippi River Commission were not made, and if they have rendered service up to this time since the 1st day of last July it has been rendered without any compensation. If you have the Army appropriation bill, the Navy appropriation bill, the Post-Office appropriation bill, the Indian appropriation bill, and the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, all the great Department bills under the control of separate committees, according to the report of the Committee on Rules, and then the sundry civil bill, which contains provisions belonging to each of them before another committee, who is to determine what estimates are to go to one committee and what to the other? Who can prevent duplications? What committee can prevent disorder injurious to the public interests and fatal to economy?

How can you adjust your appropriations in such a manner as that confusion will not arise? And remember while your estimates are indispensable and of great value in indicating what the Departments deem necessary for the Government, yet after all they are but the general indications of what the departments of the Government require. It is almost inevitable that there will be duplications when you take the sundry civil bill and place it in the hands of one committee, while the other bills appropriating for the same general purposes are sent to other committees for consideration. Take your deficiencies in the Army and Navy appropriations, Indian service, Post-Office Department, and foreign service. How can you hold your Committee on Appropriations to any accountability if you leave them in control of the deficiency bill and yet leave them wholly uninformed how the deficiencies occurred and the circumstances out of which they grew?

I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] must see on reflection that the deficiencies ought not to go to a separate committee. If they are deficiencies in the appropriations for fortifications or for the Army let them go to the committee having charge of the Army appropriation. In like manner let the deficiencies for the Navy go to the committee having charge of the naval appropriations bill; and so with the consular and diplomatic. Let the committee that knows something about that branch of the service and made the appropriations examine the details of the deficiencies. Otherwise what intelligence is there in your legislation? What intelligence can there be in it?

I think, therefore, inasmuch as the legislative, executive, and judicial bill is in a certain sense a part of all the bills, as well as the sundry civil is a part of them all, except a few which I have named, and inasmuch as the deficiency bill grows out of them all to a great extent, if you send some of these bills to one committee and others to other committees you run the risk not merely of duplicate appropriations and of mistakes in appropriations, but you run the risk inevitably of greatly increased appropriations, and no one will be responsible.

I do not think that the argument—not argument but statement which gentlemen have indulged in, that there are other committees of this House able to examine these bills as well as the Committee on Appropriations—is a fair or generous statement. Does any gentleman believe that any one of the committees of the House, I do not care what committee you name, consisting of thirteen members, could not, with a reasonable experience, frame your appropriation bills well? Gentlemen who indulge the idea that the Appropriations Committee is one that arrogates to itself more power than any other or more capacity and intelligence than any other do, I think, that committee and every other committee of this House injustice. There is nothing in the history of that committee to justify it. Your appropriation bills ought to be regarded as one bill. Your appropriations as a whole have always been regarded one general appropriation of money, as much so as if it was a budget and the appropriation made in gross in a single item with a vast number of details. You divide it up into bills simply for convenience. And, as I have mentioned, you do not divide it by Departments. All that pertains to the Navy does not go to one bill. All that pertains to the Post-Office Department does not go to one bill. You have simply provided by arbitrary rulings and by changes, in course of time correcting mistakes which have been made, what appropriations belonged to particular bills. Now you leave the sundry civil bill with one committee and yet propose to give bills of which it is only a part into the hands of other committees. How can you do this without running the risk of embarrassing the public service and especially the risk of appropriating more money than the public service requires?

An argument was indulged in by the gentleman from Illinois which I think was not distinctly heard. I thought there was great force in it. In making up committees the Speaker of the House, I suppose, takes into consideration not simply the experience but the character of the experience of a member of the House, the nature of his employment—as a banker, as a farmer, as a manufacturer, as a merchant, or the like—in determining on what committee he would render the most valuable public service. Now take the Post-Office appropriation bill, or either of the other great bills, the Army, the Navy, diplomatic and consular, or Indian appropriation bills. Suppose one of those bills under the charge of a committee. Let its members be as just, as pure, and upright and honest in the interest of the Government as they possibly can be, the department or branch of the Government to which that bill relates comes to be to them of primary engrossing importance. We can not overlook that fact. It is in view of that argument mainly that I think the Senate has refused to divide up the bills; or, at least, it has been largely upon that argument. It is certain that each of these committees will, in the nature of things, magnify the branch of the public service under their charge, and enlarged appropriations are certain to follow.

So far as possible, a positively impartial committee should be organized to consider your appropriation bills; and I think, gentlemen, you run a great risk of acting unwisely if you put the legislation for each of these various departments—the Army, the Navy, the Post-Office Department, the diplomatic service, &c.—under the control of distinct committees and the appropriations for those branches of the service under the direction of the same committees the result will ultimately be fatal to honest and frugal government.

If, for instance, the appropriations for all branches of the public service be put under the charge of one committee, that committee would not magnify any particular branch of the service to the same extent as would a committee considering one branch of the service alone. Take your Committee on Appropriations, as gentlemen here have known it, and as I have known it, give them charge of a single bill for one branch of the public service, the Army, the Navy, or the diplomatic service, and that committee would be greater than men if they did not magnify the particular duties which would devolve upon them. It is natural and proper that such should be the case if extended to appropriations; but it would increase your expenditures. No matter how upright and earnest your committees may be, the inevitable tendency under such circumstances would be to magnify the business of the particular committee, and ultimately to increase your appropriations beyond the requirements of the Government.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who generally speaks so fairly, made use of the following remarkable words:

> We propose that no committee shall have the power to put legislation on the bills.

Now my friend was not only the chairman, but the very able chairman, of the Committee on Appropriations of this House in the Forty-seventh Congress; and I would ask him whether he is able to tell the House how many legislative provisions were put upon appropriation bills reported by that committee during the time he was chairman? The bills were loaded down with legislative provisions, mostly judicious.

But a more remarkable utterance was the following:

> I am opposed to any system of rules that will crown any man or set of men as kings of a legislative body.

I would like to ask the gentleman how it happened that during the time he was presiding so ably over the Committee on Appropriations it did not occur to him that the rule giving such extraordinary power to himself and his associates was one derogatory to the honor of this House. How did my friend from New York happen to overlook that? How does that argument strike you, gentlemen? How does it strike my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who was an honored member of that committee at the same time? Not a word then about distributing these appropriation bills. In all that Congress that House did not dare even to touch the rule of economy which is now assailed.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will allow me to say that was a Republican House, and it did not propose to do any such foolish thing as distribute these bills to various committees.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend, the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-seventh Congress, would not, perhaps, give that answer. I call his attention to the fact, when he shall have occasion to consider it, that during the whole of those two years he made no appeal for a change of this rule; he made no appeal to be dethroned from the important powers of that committee, but earnestly, honestly, with credit to himself, performed the duties of its chairman till the last hour of the Congress.

My friend from Illinois has said that the rule to which he referred, known as the rule in the interest of economy in the Government, was opposed by his side of the House but received the united support of this side of the House. Gentlemen, you have now come to take for the first time in a quarter of a century the responsibilities of Government. You are pledged to administer it on the great principles which have brought the members of this side of the House together in the control of legislation. Can you afford, gentlemen, to reverse the policy we adopted at the beginning? When this responsibility is thrown upon you, can you afford to say to the country that the rule of economy which was adopted for the purpose of shielding your Treasury against the effects of improvident, extravagant, and unwise legislation has been abandoned and the directly reverse policy adopted, throwing open your Treasury to increased appropriations almost without limit or restraint?

The Republican side of the House did not disturb your committees or rules. And now all at once there seems to be a general unanimity on that side that the duties of the Committee on Appropriations should be distributed and that your rule of economy should be broken down. I admit some gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed doubt as to the wisdom of this raid upon your rules; but, as far as the general opinion expressed by those who are entitled to be recognized as representative men on that side is concerned, your rules are to be reversed, all safeguards stricken down, and a condition of things which no Congress has ever yet dared to face in the last ten years is to be brought about. Your bills broken into fragments are to be considered by different committees having no harmonious connection with each other, each only responsible to itself, and at the same time the only safeguard to economical administration in this House is to be repealed and a contrary proposition adopted. Measures in the interest of expenditure are to be in order, and measures in the interest of economy are to be out of order.

I do not believe this House will adopt any such change. I call upon you, gentlemen, in this critical period of the great political organization with which you are associated, to consider the character of both these measures, to consider it carefully, and avoid a mistake which may prove and is likely to prove an injury to the country and a disaster to the party you represent.

It is said that free scope to legislation is impossible under the old Democratic rules of the House. We can not legislate enough gentlemen say.

If there is any one maxim we all as Democrats appreciate it is the Democratic maxim, that "the world is governed too much." Take each successive year, and what do you find to be the extent of legislation by Congress? Talk to me about no opportunities for legislation! Why, take up any volume of each successive year and what do you find? Every successive Congress we have a volume of a thousand pages of legislation, and but a small portion consisting of appropriation bills. This vast body of legislation is piled up year after year, and yet we are told there are no facilities for the enactment of laws. The great trouble, on the contrary, is that there are too many measures pressed upon the attention of Congress—too much legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the same time be accorded to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that was accorded on the other side to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The tendency, in our Government at this time, Mr. Speaker, is toward too much legislation. This endless and prodigal multiplication of laws promises no good to the country. Gentlemen complain of the defeat of measures in a given Congress, forgetting the fact they are always measures which without injury to the public interests can for a time be postponed. Gentlemen complain in fact there is want of time. Does that result from the action of the Committee on Appropriations? It occupies but a small portion of the time of any session. It is further complained appropriation bills come in too late. What becomes of the time intervening between the organization of Congress and the time when appropriation bills are reported? Is not that time devoted to other legislation? The tendency is not only toward too much legislation, but it is toward encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the States. The Federal Government with limited powers, great as they are, may be greatly abused by this everlasting tendency to encroach upon powers which belong to the States. States have found it necessary to provide only biennial sessions of the Legislatures. Here for three months one year and from six to nine months the other Congress is in session. Do you think it results from the action of the Committee on Appropriations that your bills in respect to general legislation do not pass?

Take the Committee on the Public Lands, in my judgment the most important committee in the House, one engaged in bringing forward measures of the highest utility; that committee, by a rule adopted at the beginning of the last Congress, had the right of way against every other committee, save two—the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations; and yet that committee, with the highest responsibility was able to get through scarcely one-half of the bills which it had framed and reported to Congress. I trust gentlemen will not overlook that fact. The pretense is that the rules will not permit legislation—that all opportunities for legislation are cut off; and yet this Committee on Public Lands, invested with the absolute power to report and with the absolute right to have its bills considered, could only get through one-half of the bills which it reported. You are legislating too much.

I have but one additional word to add. If in the beginning you strike down the only safeguard you have for economical legislation; if you strike down the only rule underlying your legislation which prevents extravagance of expenditure; if you distribute the work of the Committee on Appropriations not in the interest of economy, I fear that the results of this Congress will not be satisfactory either to this House or to the people, whose representatives we are. If you determine to adopt the course proposed by the Committee on Rules the result in my judgment will be unfortunate, not now but in the early future. I hope my apprehension may not be realized, but I think it does not need the voice of a prophet to predict that if you repeal the rule adopted ten years ago in the interest of honest and frugal government, a rule then adopted without one dissenting voice on this side of the House, which has stood ever since as a barrier against wasteful extravagance—I say it will not require the voice of a prophet to foretell that you yourselves will in the end admit a great and vital mistake was upon the very threshold of our entry upon great responsibilities in the Forty-ninth Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, It is not my purpose to undertake a general discussion of the recommendations of the committee, or a majority of the Committee on Rules, but merely to speak to one of the propositions contained in their report—the proposed distribution of the appropriation bills among the various committees respectively charged with the subject-matters to which these bills relate. I shall vote for this proposition, and I desire in the few minutes in which I shall occupy the floor to make a hurried statement of the reasons which move me to this action.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind this question is one of supreme concern, and if we would accurately, or even approximately, measure its importance we must first clearly fix in our minds the functions and privileges of the Committee on Appropriations. And right here at the threshold I distinctly disclaim any purpose to criticise the personnel of the Committee on Appropriations. On the contrary, I am glad of the opportunity to state that during the period of my public service on this floor it has been composed of gentlemen whose acknowledged ability and manifest faithfulness to their convictions of public duty would command respect in any department of human effort. My remarks, therefore, are designed to be the discussion of a system, and not a criticism upon individuals.

The Committee on Appropriations, then, is charged with the duty of appropriating to its support the revenues of the Government. On the action of this committee, as finally perfected and matured in the two Houses of Congress, depends the continued operation of the machinery of our Government. From this committee as a source the Government draws its existence, its life. All the vast expenditures in all the various departments of the public service are under the control of this committee. These great functions, these large offices, are, from inexorable necessity, accompanied by correspondingly great privileges. Among these privileges is the privilege to report to the House at all times; but the highest privilege of all is the privilege of demanding of the House consideration of their reports at such times as the committee may suggest.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to realize the vast extent and power of this privilege. Forcibly were they stated by General Garfield in a discussion in the Forty-sixth Congress of a proposition similar to the one now under debate. Let me read a few lines from his remarks:

He said:

Whatever other things fail, these—must pass. However far into the hot weather of the summer we go, we must go by the pressure of the appropriation bills; and unless we say to one committee take this in charge and make it your chief business, we give you the primacy, we give you the priority, we waive all other things off to carry this through and accomplish it—I say unless we do that, there can be no reasonable end to our session.

Whatever else may be left undone, whatever else may be neglected in the way of legislation, the suggestions of the Committee on Appropriations must receive consideration. The money bills must pass, no matter what else fails. In a word, sir, these bills have the right of way from necessity, they have the right of way as against all other matters of legislation; and, sir, the passage of these bills invariably terminates a long session of Congress. Now, sir, from this simple statement it must be obvious to the commonest understanding that the supreme power of controlling the proceedings of this House is lodged in the Committee on Appropriations. The destinies, Mr. Speaker, think of it, the destinies of 60,000,000 people who inhabit this country, so far as these destinies are affected by legislation, are in the hands of fifteen members on this floor, and are virtually subject to their control. What is the effect on the other committees of the House? They are practically reduced to subordinate stations. Measurably is this true, sir, of even the great Committee on Ways and Means. Look at the Judiciary Committee. Once high in dignity and powerful in its functions, that committee to-day is but the splendid grave in which is buried some of the noblest legal talent of America. And, sir, the same thing is true of other committees. What is the effect on the general membership of the House? Why, sir, of the three hundred and twenty-five Congressional districts into which this country is divided but fifteen have an opportunity to be fully heard on this floor. Three hundred and ten, in whole or in part, are denied representation. I was startled to-day, Mr. Speaker, at a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], showing the supreme power which the chairman of this one committee can exercise in this House. If I did not mistake him, he made this statement substantially, that two Congresses ago there were two bills, perhaps the internal-revenue bill and the tariff-commission bill, which he thought the best interests of this Government required should be passed. He made the startling statement that in the exercise of the power which he had as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he was enabled to so handle two of the great appropriation bills as to secure the passage of the two matters of legislation in which he thought the interests of the country were wrapped up. He said he exercised this power, that he exercised it successfully and he still thinks wisely. Now, what I think and say is this: However wisely or however well that power may have been exercised in the past, it is a power which no man and no set of men should exercise on this floor. [Applause.]

The existence, Mr. Speaker, of this primacy, which General Garfield accorded to the Committee on Appropriations, was clearly indicated by another distinguished leader on the floor in that same debate. I refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. I will read just one paragraph, showing the extent, in his opinion, to which this system goes and its tendencies. While the gentleman was discussing this very proposition of scattering the power of the Committee on Appropriations, he used this language:

In regard to the scattering of the service of this committee among the various other committees of this House I have very decided views. I believe that whatever party may be in the ascendant in this House the party discipline and the party judgment as to economical expenditures of the public money will lead in the direction of having a single head to control.

Mr. Speaker, with all respect to the gentlemen who are fighting for the continuance of the power of this committee I submit that the autocracy here championed is not only antagonistic to, but utterly subversive of, the representative principle on which not only this House but all our free institutions are constructed, and I submit further that this situation of things ought not to be perpetuated a day longer.

Oh, yes; but we are told that there are great embarrassments, there are great inconveniences, there are positive evils which will follow any change of the rules in this respect. Mr. Speaker, concede for the sake of argument—and I make the concession only for that purpose—concede that inconvenience, embarrassment, yea, that positive evils will result from the proposed change, still I declare it as my deliberate judgment that it is far better to encounter such inconvenience and such evils than longer to submit to the domination in this House of a handful of its members. [Applause.]

But, sir, let us look at this matter for a moment. I deny that the evils which have been so abundantly prophesied as likely to result from this proposed change—I deny that they will come to pass. Let us look at them. We are told, in the first place, that if we distribute these money bills the expenditure of the Government will be vastly increased. With solemn shakings of the head and ominous rollings of the eye we are constantly admonished by the more experienced members of this House that the expenditures of the Government will be vastly swollen if this proposed change is effected.

This, sir, is nothing in the world but naked assertion. The truth is that the logic of the situation conducts to a different conclusion; that is, unless it be claimed for the Committee on Appropriations that they are possessed of higher intelligence and a greater disposition to frugality than the members of any other committee; and I believe that claim will not be advanced. But, sir, suppose these bills are scattered—the Army bill given to the Military Committee, the naval bill to the Naval Committee, and so on. Each one of these committees is charged, specially charged, with the supervision only of that particular branch of the public service. Hence that committee—take, for instance, the Military Committee, which has supervision of the military establishment of the Government, and that only—will have greater time and more enlarged opportunities for investigation than any committee could have which is charged with the general supervision of all branches of the Government. Hence, if you concede to the Military Committee equal wisdom, an equal disposition to economy, equal patriotism with the Appropriations Committee, the conclusion inevitably follows that the tendency would be to greater accuracy and a nearer approach to perfection in the expenditures for the military establishment. And why? Because this committee, having larger opportunities to investigate the needs of the service, being equally honest, equally patriotic, would discover the points at which reforms could be made, where retrenchment could be effected without injury to the public service, and would recommend them.

In view of these facts the admonitions on this point have produced no apprehension in my mind. But what is the other difficulty? And here it seems to me gentlemen have gone out purely into the region of fancy. They tell us that if this proposed distribution is effected the harmony and symmetry which now characterize our system of fiscal legislation will be disturbed. The older members of this House remember the manner in which General Garfield presented this idea in the Forty-sixth Congress. He told us—of course I do not undertake to give his language but merely his idea—that there were two great committees in this House, that they stood back to back, the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means, the latter facing the people and their sources of revenue, and thus being enabled to determine what amount of taxation the people could bear; the other, the Committee on Appropriations, facing the machinery of government, and thus being able to determine how much was needed for the administration of its affairs. These two committees, gentlemen now tell us, thus interchanging the knowledge acquired by each in its respective sphere, constitute a perfect and symmetrical and harmonious system of fiscal legislation. This may be, Mr. Speaker, very pretty metaphor, but it is utterly without foundation in point of fact, as was pertinently suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge KELLEY, on yesterday. No such relations have ever existed between these two great committees. They have never imparted and do not in practice impart to each other this information which this figure of General Garfield's would indicate.

But again and right here I ask the careful attention of the House to this point. This harmony of action, this unity of purpose argument, which seems to be a favorite theme with some of our friends on the other side of this debate, is utterly fallacious for another reason. The idea that the Government has just so much money to expend in a given year and that the money bills, therefore, should be in the hands of one committee to the end that that committee may equitably distribute the ascertained amount among the various branches of the public service—I say that idea is a flagrant fallacy. Nay, it is the very essence of profligacy. It is the principle, sir, on which the spendthrift, the prodigal, acts, "I have got just so much money to spend for this twelve months and spend it I will; and now what shall I spend it for?" That is not the true theory of fiscal legislation, but the very reverse of it.

The correct principle is this: First ascertain the needs of the Government, how much money is required to run its various Departments, economically but efficiently administered, and then let the taxing committee—the Committee on Ways and Means—cast up the general aggregate and raise that amount by suitable taxation. That is the true theory of fiscal legislation, and that is the principle of the Morrison proposition.

This proposition is to put these money bills in the hands of committees who have time, who have opportunity to investigate them, and ascertain their several needs, and then let the Committee on Ways and Means cast up the general aggregate and lay the necessary duties.

Mr. Speaker, as I indicated a few moments ago, this oneness of design, this "harmony of action," this "unity of purpose," of which the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks in his minority report, is not consistent with the genius and spirit of our institutions; it is not the object for which the framers of this Government labored. They sought not to concentrate power in the hands of a few men to the end that "harmony of action" and "unity of purpose" might be secured, but their great aim was the general diffusion of power among all the people, and its ultimate expression through the agency of the representative principle.

It is true that some of the men who participated in the establishment of our institutions participated also in adopting the fiscal system that now prevails in this House. But, sir, remember that the conditions then were widely different from the conditions that surround us to-day. Then the House of Representatives was small in numbers, consisting, I believe, of but sixty-six members. Then the House of Representatives was in fact as well as in theory a deliberative body. How is it to-day? We have swollen our membership to three hundred and twenty-five. The House practically has ceased to be a deliberative body. Its work is matured and perfected and accomplished in the committee-room; so that a system which in the early days of the Republic promoted the development of the representative idea might now be utterly subversive of that principle.

I repeat, then, that this idea of concentrating vast powers of Government in the hands of a few men to the end that "harmony of action" and "unity of purpose" may be secured, is not the theory on which the fathers constructed this Government. This was not their object. If they had been laboring to this end they would not have been the builders of a Republic. On the contrary their work would have been fashioned after models of government found on the other side of the seas. Had "harmony of action," "unity of purpose," resulting from concentrated power, been the objects for which the framers of this Government labored, profitably could they have studied (as I had occasion to declare in a prior Congress on a kindred subject) the structure of that gigantic despotism planted amid the snows and icebergs of Northern Europe, where the autocratic idea, "oneness of design," "unity of purpose," enables the Russian despot to keep firmly riveted the chains of slavery on his eighty millions of oppressed and degraded subjects. With equal advantage could they have explored the machinery of that other equally gigantic despotism farther south, where through "oneness of design," "unity of purpose," resulting from concentrated power, the iron-hearted Prince of Germany commands mighty, resistless armies to the execution of the will of his imperial master.

No, sir; the framers of this Government sought no such object. They built on a nobler principle. Theirs was a grander conception—that of a representative democracy; and in the realization of that grand conception we have to-day the American Republic, a government wise and beneficent, a government for which the past furnished no model, and of which the future will never be able to make a copy.

Mr. Speaker, I know not what action other Representatives may take on this question; my own course is resolved on. Others, if their judgments so incline them, may by their votes aid in condemning the general membership of this House to further vassalage and again fastening upon them the despotism of a single committee. For myself, my voice shall be raised and my vote cast to subvert rather than perpetuate the mischievous domination. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] yield the remainder of his time—thirty-two minutes?

Mr. WELLBORN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the real issue joined here has not yet been presented on either side of this House. It is an old struggle that has gone on through many Congresses and is here with us at this time—the Committee on Appropriations on the one hand urging their own views in behalf of their jurisdiction with an exaggeration which will not be accepted by the House; the other committees presenting the grievances they have suffered at the hands of the Committee on Appropriations, grievances which will not be justified upon examination. Time and again have we heard from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and from other committees representing the several departments of the Government that they have had no hearing in this House. It is true. The Committee on Appropriations have usurped much of that jurisdiction.

But I do not believe the real remedy, the proper adjustment of the trouble, lies in either proposition before this House. My own opinion is that we shall best settle this difficulty in a manner the propriety of which I shall endeavor to illustrate by the history of these committees; that is, by taking from the Committee on Appropriations and from any committee charged with the preparation of any of the general appropriation bills any power to put a single legislative proposition upon such a bill, and then remitting to these other committees not the power to come in with all sorts of propositions that they may see fit to report and which have no precedent here, but the duty of reporting suitable legislation with reference to the interests of their respective departments. To illustrate: The Secretary of the Navy tells you that the Navy Department needs reorganization. On a former occasion I learned from the Secretary of the Treasury that the system of book-keeping in that Department is a patchwork; that one Congress would adopt a proposition involving proper checks and balances in the matter of accounts, and in a few years another Congress with a new committee, unacquainted with the workings of the Department, uninformed as to the history of legislation, would bring forward another system of book-keeping. In this way matters have gone on until there are in that Department four or five independent systems having no relation to each other.

So I might go forward illustrating how under the rules of the House preventing these committees from having a hearing all these things have been left unadjusted and uncorrected. It is right, sir, in my judgment, that these several committees should have the same right in regard to that character of legislation which the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means possess, that is, to report important measures to the House and to have those measures take precedence of consideration. When you have done that you will have struck from the Committee on Appropriations any excuse for putting general legislation on appropriation bills. You will also have taken from the House all disposition after it has been deprived of a hearing to force important and needed legislation upon appropriation bills. You will then have magnified the other committees of the House by permitting them to file their reports involving subjects of great public interest and granting them the right of that hearing they are entitled to on this floor.

Why, sir, the Army, the Navy, the Treasury, and other departments of the Government have no hearing to-day in this House, while you set apart every Friday for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, bills for the payment of loose claims coming here merely upon ex parte statements. Those bills are passed by this House when others are neglected. Yet you will not give these committees representing great departments of the Government the right to come forward with the great measures of reform which they have matured. When you do give them the right to have their measures considered they will care very little for the mere matter of appropriations contained in appropriation bills.

Indeed, sir, I have said there were extravagances on both sides of the House. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] inadvertently, no doubt, in an interview given by the Associated Press, stated, by way of showing how the appropriations had increased when they had been severed from the Committee on Appropriations, what I will read. He took the years 1876, 1877, 1879, and 1880 to show the expenditure of those years on rivers and harbors, as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not to be held responsible for errors. I stated that proposition very clearly yesterday and showed the years when those appropriations for rivers and harbors came from the Committee on Commerce. Prior to that time they had gone to the Committee on Appropriations either for review or some advantage in precedence.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would not do the gentleman from Pennsylvania any injustice. On page 101 of the RECORD of December 16 it is stated "the Clerk read as follows." This is from the speech of the gentleman himself. He sent to the Clerk's desk to be read for the information of the House the following: "Committee on Commerce and Rivers and Harbors, 1885." Here is the table printed which my friend sent to the Clerk's desk to be read, and which was read just as he is reported as saying in the Associated Press dispatch.

Mr. RANDALL. The paper I sent to the Clerk's desk is correct in stating that those bills came from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not what the gentleman had read at the Clerk's desk. I will again read for his information from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations for rivers and harbors.

Prior to reference of bill to Committee on Commerce:
1876	$6,648,517 50
1877	5,015,000 00
1879	8,322,700 00
1880	9,577,494 61
Committee on Commerce and Rivers and Harbors:
1881	8,976,500 00
1882	11,451,300 00
1883	18,988,875 00
1885	14,948,300 00
Average appropriation per annum for four years prior to reference of river and harbor bill to Committee on Commerce	7,390,928 02
Average appropriation per annum since reference to Committee on Commerce	13,591,243 75

Mr. RANDALL. I have sent for the original.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to any correction being made. I wish to say, no matter what the gentleman from Pennsylvania did say or what he intended to say, it has gone in the press dispatches from one end of the country to the other that he did say what he is reported to have said there. Such is the understanding of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I tried to correct that twice, and did correct it personally to the gentleman himself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not object to the gentleman correcting it, but it has gone to the country, and the country has the right to the correction of the error.

Mr. RANDALL. The country had it, and I thought the gentleman had it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know what the gentleman thought or what he intended. Any gentleman can read the contrary in the RECORD. I would not misrepresent the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because I have a profound respect for him.

Mr. RANDALL. You do not seem to pay much attention to my correction.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will leave that to the House. I have only referred to the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the RECORD, and if there is any injustice in that I do not see where it is.

Mr. RANDALL. I tried to correct the impression in your mind.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will understand me that the country had got a different impression from the Associated Press dispatch, which has been corroborated by the report of the gentleman's speech made by the Official Reporters of the House and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now I trust the gentleman can find no purpose of disrespect toward him. I have never indulged in such reflection on this floor upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman, and since my service here I am glad to say no discourtesy has ever been shown to me. Now, Mr. Speaker, that argument, therefore, all falls to the ground so far as the river and harbor bill is concerned, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania now himself repudiates, or corrects the statement, if he sees fit to put it in that form.

In that same report the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us how the appropriations for the Agricultural Bureau, which had been supported for a round sum of $189,000, I think, had increased to the neighborhood of $400,000. Well, in the first place the agricultural bill, now by the action of the House not on an appropriation bill, contains several other matters of appropriation for consideration, and which must be provided for, and the committee were bound to make provision in accordance with the additional legislation. But let us see how unfair that statement is on comparison with other bills. Suppose I take the Committee on Appropriations and try that committee by the rule thus set up. Let us take Powell's Survey as an illustration to begin with. In 1878 this cost $50,000 and in 1885 $400,000; an increase of eightfold, far beyond what the agricultural appropriations have increased. The Geological Survey is running beyond what the Committee on Agriculture has appropriated for its vast increase. Take, again, the Signal Service. Under the control of the Committee on Appropriations this service has gone from $440,000 to $847,000 from 1878 to 1885. The Fish Commission has gone from $75,000 to $257,000. Now I am not undertaking to discuss the merits of these increases, but to show that the argument made here is an unfair one.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit a suggestion?

Mr. BLOUNT. With pleasure.

Mr. BRAGG. I hold in my hand the figures of the aggregate appropriations made by the sundry civil bill for the year 1880, showing $17,634,868.56, while for the year 1886, coming from the same general Appropriations Committee, it is $26,079,251.49, showing a large increase.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was aware of the increase, but am obliged to the gentleman for the statement of it to the House. I do not undertake to say that the growth of these bills has not been legitimate. Population and wealth will multiply; public interests will increase, and the expenditures of the Government must necessarily increase with them. With all the care that has been taken by a Democratic House from that time forward, and even with the aid of this side of the House in the Forty-seventh Congress given to the Committee on Appropriations on the other side, we have not been able to make anything but a gradual increase of appropriations.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is it not true that the sundry civil appropriation bill will include items one year that did not belong to it or were not provided for by it in a former year, or are the items contained in the bill always fixed like the items of other general appropriation bills?

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course it is a miscellaneous bill and covers a variety of items, but at the same time there has been a gradual growth of that bill for many years; and I must be permitted to add that it has very largely come, this increase, from the Senate Chamber, from the very gentlemen who were invited to discuss the question of economy with this House and to lead and guide it.

Now, the Forty-fourth Congress changed the rules so as to provide that there should be no general legislation on appropriation bills, except in the case of certain provisions, which have been quoted to the House so often that they are now understood. At the time that proposition was brought before the House I supported it with pleasure. The public interests required it. The public expenditures were great; a financial crisis had come upon the country. The Republican party, with its friends in all the Departments, was utterly incompetent to make this reduction. Their friends stood with fixed bayonets driving them on in the contest with this House in its attempt to reduce expenditures. Many were frank enough in private conversation to say that our side would be able to reduce expenditures because we had no party friends in the Departments, but they were not. Reductions did take place, which were facilitated by the falling off of the public revenues and the great financial crisis prevailing at the time. I have no complaint now of that work. It was right and proper then. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] then headed the Committee on Appropriations, and gave to the Democratic party of this country a record of economy that made it, thank God, one of the idols of Democracy—not that it was an original idea, not that it had not been in existence in the past, but it inaugurated in this House a great measure of reform which the country needed.

But, sir, time has intervened. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who has just spoken with so much power and fertility of thought by reason of long experience in this House, when setting forth the advantages of this rule told you that he had reduced expenditures over $60,000,000 in the Forty-fourth Congress. So it was done, in my judgment. But afterward, running on through the years from then till now, how much reduction has taken place? We had gotten almost to bed-rock. We had gotten to a point where the opposition to this side of the House were enabled to come in and report their bills almost unanimously. That has been the history of these bills for years. Then what? The natural result followed. It was very natural that the Committee on Appropriations should undertake legislation in addition to what grew out of the rules. That Committee on Appropriations, which is so jealous of the other committees of the House, which is so much alarmed about the danger of distributing the appropriation bills, which is so careful to preserve all the rules relating to appropriations, at the very last session of this Congress came in with the Post-Office appropriation bill filled with new legislation, and I will take that because my friend from Indiana has just cited that bill——

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The last Post-Office appropriation bill contained quite a number of legislative provisions, but I inquired of a gentleman in charge of those provisions in that committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who is now before me, and I understand that they were all provisions agreed upon by the committee. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania remember that?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do very well. The four provisions emanated from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, but they went into the appropriation bill because we could not get them recognized in the House; and I hope to speak on that point later in this debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah, Mr. Speaker, I want to state the facts and see whether or not the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was correct in this matter and whether the Committee on Appropriations was correct in it. The previous Congress had reduced letter postage from 3 to 2 cents. The report of the Postmaster-General at the time announced to Congress that there would be a falling off in the revenue of several millions of dollars by reason of that change; exactly what the reduction would be time alone would disclose. It seems to me, sir, that under these circumstances it was about time to pause in the matter of legislation on the appropriations bill, by getting into it a provision reducing letter postage further and the postage on newspapers.

But, Mr. Speaker, how about this? The Committee on Appropriations in their committee-room agreed to the following resolution and put it on the sundry civil bill:

Resolved, That it is expedient that there should be a suspension of silver coinage.

Who told them to put that there? Under what rule of the House was that placed there? Who gave them this power? There are other committees in this House with jurisdiction over this matter and especially charged with it, and it does not appear and will not appear that they were invited to do that. The truth about the matter is, the Committee on Appropriations are just like any other men in this House, just like men to be found everywhere. If they are permitted to use power they will exercise it.

There is another view to which I wish to call the attention of the House. It has been urged here by several gentlemen that the division of the appropriations ought not to be made because a division of the work would prevent a general superintendence by one head. Well, sir, rhetoric is very pleasant, theories are very agreeable, but in legislation the actual facts are much more valuable. I had the pleasure of serving upon that committee for six years and gave its duties considerable attention. In the Forty-fifth Congress I reported the Post-Office appropriations bill; I made it up in my room in the Christmas recess and reported it to a subcommittee of excellent gentlemen who had the confidence of this House. They concurred in it. It went to the Committee on Appropriations, and they looked at it but one day and they concurred in it, and it went through this House with the addition of only $5,000 and became a law with that addition, and I never heard during the whole of the discussion the suggestion how much can we give to the postal service. I served on the committee which prepared the naval appropriation bill and helped to make it up, and I never heard such a suggestion as to that bill. Those bills have been agreed upon successively by the committee, first one and then another. Two or three were reported in this House and passed and after them another, and at the end came the sundry civil and deficiency bills, and until the bills were passed nobody knew what we were going to expend. The work is subdivided in that committee. I know that occasionally there are gentlemen on that committee who feel a great interest in the appropriations—two or three members of the committee or possibly more—and who watch the separate bills very closely, looking to the end, but with no purpose of restraining them to any given sum.

Now let us see when these bills have gone to the other committees that have been proposed whether or not there will be an increase of expenditure. I will not undertake to say whether there will or will not. The facts which have been cited fail to give us any information on that subject. Let us take the Post-Office bill, and let us put on it what is permitted by the report of the majority of the Committee on Rules. I believe that proposition to put on appropriation bills contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government will be used just as every other legislative provision has been. It will be conveniently construed by some gentleman selected perhaps to preside over the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of doing it. That has been the experience in reference to every rule you have ever had here.

The restriction has been ridden over. Now when you shall have stricken off the legislative provision, then the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads take up the estimates; and what do they find there? Your mails must be transported by railway, and you know almost exactly what it will be. Whether it be much or little, the transportation of mails is paid for by weight. If you have not appropriated enough a deficiency must supply it. If you have appropriated too much it is covered into the Treasury under the operation of law. I may say the same of the item as to the compensation of postmasters. And these are the two large items in the Post-Office appropriation bill. As to the star-route service, this House has always, or for many years, given whatever was needed for that service, and we have had no question of economy as to that. Then we have had some appropriation of money for the steamboat service; and the balance of the items are insignificant.

Now take the naval bill. The Committee on Naval Affairs take charge of that bill with the intention on the part of the House that there shall not go upon it a single legislative provision. What do they find? The great item is that for the payment of the officers and men of the Navy, which is fixed by law and can not be increased or decreased and it is a matter of absolute mathematical calculation.

Then you come to the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the Bureau of Steam-engineering. These items are matters about which there is no legislation—matters for the judgment of this House as to how much it will give for steam-engineering or for construction and repair. If the appropriate committee takes up these subjects and considers them, not as has been done in the past, when under the rules they had no charge of the subject but could merely come in here and make recommendations for the action of another committee—if the appropriate committee should now take up the expenditures of the Government in this Department, understanding that the House has cast upon them the responsibility, understanding that their action will be subject to just criticism, why will they not take the history of the Navy in its expenditures; why will they not take up report after report and see what has been done in the past, as these other gentlemen have done? What will be the inducement to go beyond this? Not the endeavor to adopt new legislation, because if the majority report, qualified by providing for the prohibition of legislation on these bills, be adopted they will have no power. So I might go on through these several bills.

I do not believe the question of economy is half so large in connection with this question as it would appear from some arguments pressed upon this House. I believe that the rule which has been so frequently cited has served its purpose and had its day; that all legislation on appropriations bills will be hurtful. The gentleman from Illinois has seen fit to state to this House the magnificent course of his party up to the time when, as he claims, our party brought this great evil upon the country. I heard that charge in the Forty-fourth Congress from Republican after Republican in the Senate Chamber; I heard it in this House from Republican after Republican. But at last there came forward a frank, broad, intelligent man, the present presiding officer of the Senate, JOHN SHERMAN, who confronted his party in the Senate and said it was idle to attack the Democratic party for any such vice, for it had been the practice of his own party during the whole time it was in power, and it had been the practice from the earliest days. The only method of correction, in my judgment, is to prevent, on the part of any committee, legislation upon appropriation bills, and to give committees charged with legislation in reference to great matters of public interest the right to come before this House and have those great interests considered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask to be allowed to go on a few moments longer.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the gentleman be granted leave to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to make a single statement before he resumes?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] a moment ago alluded to the large disparity in the amount of appropriations between the sundry civil bill for 1880 and that for 1886. I was not prepared at the moment to refer accurately to the figures which in part explain that disparity. I find upon examination that the sundry civil appropriation bill for 1880 did not contain, as passed, the usual appropriations for the expenses of the United States courts, which had been transferred that year to the legislative bill, the bill which had upon it the legislation with reference to United States marshals, the bill which failed that year, and was subsequently vetoed at the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress. The amount thus transferred, accounting in part for the difference referred to, was $3,121,000.

It should also be borne in mind that the sundry civil appropriation act for 1886 contained, as passed, enormous appropriations for public buildings. The Committee on Appropriations reported appropriations for such purposes to the amount of $1,794,719.84, to which the Senate, by amendments to which the House subsequently yielded, but with which the Committee on Appropriations had nothing to do, added in round numbers $2,200,000, making in all for these purposes $3,988,-319.84.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to give figures showing the aggregate amount of the sundry civil bills for each year from 1880 to 1886?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. They are as follows:

For 1880	$17,634,868 56
For 1881	22,503,508 23
For 1882	22,092,194 12
For 1883	25,589,358 06
For 1884	23,679,575 44
For 1885	22,299,434 30
For 1886	26,079,251 49

Mr. RANDALL. And almost invariably those increases were made in the Senate or in the House—rarely I think were they recommended by the Committee on Appropriations. The Appropriations Committee, with all their energy and determination, have been unable in many cases to resist these increases. But I admit there necessarily must be some increase of appropriation in consequence of the increasing population and the increasing business of the country.

Mr. BRAGG. Does not the increase of appropriation for the Agricultural Department come from similar causes?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know what Congress has to do with these various matters, such as education. I have never believed that Congress ought to have anything to do with education in the States. I believe that the system of education there can be sufficiently cared for by the States themselves.

Mr. BRAGG. I spoke of appropriations for agricultural purposes, not for education.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not now speak otherwise than from memory, but my memory on this subject is pretty good. There has been a great increase in our sundry civil bills from the Forty-fourth Congress down to the present time. The exact figures I can not give. But I am not complaining in regard to the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the Senate has forced upon us in many cases these increases. This suggests to me another thought. I believe that the Committee on Appropriations, if they had no power to incorporate legislation in the general appropriation bills, could report every one of these bills at an early stage of the session, and we would not in the closing hours of every session be involved in a struggle with the Senate, that body saying, "Give us legislation on an appropriation bill; give us this thing we have so frequently denounced or you shall not go home to your families."

I remember that in the dead hours of the night—at 2 o'clock in the morning—at the last session of Congress, when the majority side of this House time and again refused appropriations of large sums in Senate amendments which were designed to entangle this Government in relation to the Nicaragua Canal in treaty stipulations and other complications—I say the effort was repeated time and again in the dead hours of the night, at 2 o'clock in the morning, when the House was so worn and anxious, that at last it yielded under physical exhaustion to the Senate, and that appropriation was forced upon it. So, sir, very much of that power which the Senate has over this House comes from the fact that the House bills do not get in at an earlier date, and they do not get in at an earlier date because so much legislation of a general character is placed upon them.

Take, for instance, at the last session the Post-Office appropriation bill, and I ask the attention of gentlemen who were here at that time to the debate on that bill. We could have passed that bill in three hours if there had been no general legislation upon it, but, on the contrary, the whole time was taken up, hour after hour and day after day, in discussing the mode of compensating railroads for carrying the mails and the rates of postage. And it will be found, if the RECORD is examined, that the great bulk of the time taken up in discussion is taken up in that way.

I believe, sir, not in taking these bills away from the committee, and for reasons I shall give hereafter, but I do believe in taking from that committee any right or privilege of putting a single thought upon any one of the appropriation bills in the nature of changing existing law. And I do believe at the same time, Mr. Speaker, in giving all proper legislative functions to the other committees, allowing them a hearing in this House the same as has heretofore been allowed to the Ways and Means and Appropriations Committees of having the legislation reported by them fully and fairly considered?

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention for one moment to a statement of fact made by him which perhaps he might like to correct?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly, as I have no wish to mislead the House.

Mr. ROGERS. It is no misleading of the House; but the point to which I wish to call his attention is one of fact. The gentleman referred to an appropriation of $2,000,000 forced upon the House for the Nicaragua Canal scheme. It was not for the Nicaragua Canal scheme, but it was in favor of subsidies to steamship companies for carrying the mails.

Mr. BLOUNT. I thank the gentleman for his correction. It was, as he states, for subsidies to steamship companies that the $2,000,000 were forced upon the Post-Office appropriation bill. We were finally able to beat down the canal scheme, but we had to fight into the dead hours of the night before we could accomplish that result. These two propositions, one involving the Government in delicate foreign complications, in treaties and stipulations, the end of which no man could foretell, the very secret of them still remaining a secret to this day, not having been communicated to Congress as yet, and the other an appropriation of $2,000,000 as subsidies to steamship companies, kept all other legislation from the floor. That has been a trouble all the time, that we have been forced by the Senate just in that way to yield to these matters of general legislation placed in precisely a similar way upon the general appropriation bills.

The House has indulged me and I will not abuse its patience. While I do not apprehend any danger of increased expenditures from the transfer of these bills, yet I contend the functions of the other committees will rise in magnitude if you give them the right to report legitimate legislation with the right to have a fair hearing for it before the House. It will take up all the time they will have to spare to consider and mature the important matters properly coming before them. Then the time of the Committee of the Whole would not be required in the matter of compensating railroads by weight and space and speed, or to go into the testimony and innumerable calculations of experts. When the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads had reached a right conclusion they would have settled the trouble long ago instead of having this matter thrust upon the House by every administration. Such would have been the result if the Post-Office Committee had been allowed to have a fair hearing before the House for the consideration of its reports. Give it that work, and it will have enough to engage its time and attention.

And so you can take all these other committees, and when you have done that—that is, when you have given them the right to a fair hearing—instead of hasty legislation on appropriation bills, we should pursue the safe course of acting calmly and deliberately on proper reports in due season. I would not cripple those committees, but I would give them their full manhood in this House. It is not any little matter of appropriating a small sum for the Navy or the Post-Office service, as a large part of it is already fixed by law. I would permit the appropriations to remain with the Appropriations Committee.

We will first take the deficiency bill. That is made up of amounts of money from the Naval Committee, the Post-Office Committee, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and so on, all relating to the several Departments of the Government. In order to understand whether the deficiencies are correct or proper it is important for the Committee on Appropriations to qualify themselves by information coming from the Departments in relation to the expenditures provided for before they can determine intelligently in reference to those deficiencies. You must give them that bill or you will have a deficiency bill from every committee in the House, and that of itself will induce, in my judgment, the disapproval of any proposition to take that bill from that committee.

Take the sundry civil bill, and it is made up of items relating to the several Departments. For instance, the dry-docks and many other items never go into the Navy appropriation bill, but are reserved for the sundry civil bill. The gentleman from Indiana has better illustrated this than I can. That bill is made up very much like the deficiency bill, relating as it does to the business of the Government in the several Departments.

The committee in charge of that bill must go over the whole ground. They must take up every one of these Department reports, and after examining them carefully to see what the public service requires, they are competent to frame the bill. Let all your bills be prepared in this manner, with the responsibility to the country which their formation imposes—for there is after all something more of responsibility on one man than when the work is divided among three—and with no power to legislate, but with power alone to report how much shall be expended, with the duty to take up all of the subjects relating to appropriations found in the reports, and they will be better qualified, in my judgment, for that work than if they had any legislation of any kind, and better than another committee which is charged with legislation.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, what has been said about the one-man power of the Committee on Appropriations. Take its legislation away and there is no power except that of appropriation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is reported here to have said that when chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he had in his fist two bills and was invested with power to prevent important legislation o the sort the country desired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not say that. I said that I had forwarded legislation; that I had kept Congress in session until it passed certain bills.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, the gentleman says he kept those bills in his hand or kept Congress here until it had passed them. Why, Mr. Speaker, is it quite certain that the House would not have passed those bills any way in spite of the gentleman? But suppose one man can do that, and you give the power to nine appropriation committees in this House every one of them with the power to keep a bill in their pockets until you pass some other.

The evil does not belong to the Committee on Appropriations alone; it may happen anywhere, and is vicious, no matter from whence it comes. But I do not believe the gentleman from New York exercised so much power as he thought. I think it very likely his associates on the Committee on Appropriations and the general sentiment of the House were on his side or he would not have dared it.

Mr. Speaker, I have sought to do my simple duty in regard to these questions. I regret to find myself not in harmony with either one of these reports. I may be in error in my views as I have stated them here, but I am responsible to my own conscience and to my constituents, and if I have done my duty in the expression of these sentiments on the floor I shall content myself with that. [Applause.]

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the discussion of this question I shall first yield a portion of my time to my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY was recognized.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly I will. I shall esteem the motion most gracious at this hour of the day.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted until Tuesday, 22d instant, to Mr. BURLEIGH, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. HATCH (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Wood, administrator of George Wood; of Thomas H. Webb, asking compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late rebellion—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1885.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM OREGON.

Mr. DOLPH presented the credentials of John H. Mitchell, chosen by the Legislature of Oregon a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1885; which were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed upon the files of the Senate. The Senator-elect will please come forward and take the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. MITCHELL advanced to the desk of the President pro tempore, escorted by Mr. DOLPH, and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PATENT OFFICE ROOMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents.

The joint resolution was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the joint resolution may be read at length so that it will go in the RECORD, and then, having received its second reading, that it may lie on the table, and I shall ask to have it taken up and passed to-morrow. I think there will be no objection to it on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read the second time at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to use so much of the contingent fund, not exceeding $600, as was appropriated by the act of March 3, 1885, for the use of the Interior Department as may be necessary to put in proper repair the rooms in the Interior Department building which have been assigned by the Secretary for the use of the Commissioner of Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table for the present.

REPORT OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with section 4690 of the Revised Statutes, the annual report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress made in that work during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, accompanied by a map illustrating the advance in the general operations of the survey; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of James E. Macklin, late second lieutenant Eleventh Infantry, praying for restoration to his original rank before dismissal in November, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of John Donnelly and other citizens of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, praying that a pension be granted to Magdalena Fonash, widow of John Fonash, late a private in Company E, One hundred and fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of a committee formed by the Association of Union Soldiers who lost an arm or leg during the war of the rebellion, praying for such legislation in their behalf as will do equal justice to all. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying the forfeiture of the land granted to aid in the construction of a railroad from Waldo to Tampa, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, to report the same without amendment and recommend its passage.

I give notice that I shall endeavor to call up the bill and ask its early passage by the Senate immediately after the measures which have already begun (the amendment of the rules, the bill providing for the Presidential succession, and the bill in regard to the salaries of Federal judges), shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 484) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey certain premises in the city of Chicago, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 640) to perfect the military record of John C. Green, of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 15) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1885, on the 21st day of said month; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONCURRENT OR OTHER RESOLUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are now in order. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], which was laid over under the rules. The resolution will be read.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to submit a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution which was laid over yesterday, under the rules of the Senate, is now to be laid before the body.

Mr. PLUMB. I submit that the proper construction of our procedure is that resolutions shall first be introduced, and that that order can not be or should not be displaced under the rule by the consideration of resolutions introduced on a preceding day, which may exhaust the entire morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the practice under the rule is directly the contrary, and that a resolution which was laid over under the rule must be presented at the call of the order of "concurrent or other resolutions." That, the Chair is advised, has been the custom of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a custom that would be more "honored in the breach than in the observance." The request of my colleague is undoubtedly correct, that the ruling should be such that resolutions could be offered immediately after the conclusion of the order for the introduction of bills, because unless that is the order, as he has suggested, a resolution coming up from the previous day for discussion may occupy the entire remainder of the morning hour, and no opportunity be offered for the introduction of resolutions. Resolutions offered to-day are not subject to debate. Upon any Senator objecting to their consideration they go over under the rules and are printed. Therefore I hope, if the rule will admit of a double interpretation, that that one will be adopted which will facilitate the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks the Secretary to read the rule under which the practice has grown up. As a matter of course the Chair will be very willing to conform to any rule that the Senate may prescribe.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The presiding officer shall then call for, in the following order:
"The presentation of petitions and memorials;
"Reports of standing and select committees;
"The introduction of bills and joint resolutions;
"Concurrent and other resolutions;"
all which shall be received and disposed of in such order unless unanimous consent shall be otherwise given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under that rule the Chair is advised that the custom has been to first lay a resolution thus laid over under the rule before the Senate; but as a matter of course the procedure is subject to the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Has it not been the practice of the Senate to have presented first the resolutions which are introduced in the morning and afterward to lay before the Senate the resolutions that came over? I have a very distinct recollection that at a former time there was some debate in the Senate as to whether resolutions which were laid over from the previous day came under this order at all, or whether there should not be a calendar of resolutions and that they should go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The occupant of the chair can not answer the question from his own personal recollection, but he is advised by the Chief Clerk that uniformly the rule has been adopted of presenting to the Senate resolutions laid over under objection in the first instance. It is subject, however, to the disposition of the Senate. The Chair simply wishes to follow the rule.

Mr. HOAR. A discussion came up in the Senate a year or two ago on that subject when the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was in the chair.

Mr. HARRIS. My recollection is that the uniform practice of the Senate since I have held a seat upon this floor has been to receive resolutions offered during the morning hour in their order and before the consideration of resolutions offered upon a previous day, except perhaps during a period of the last two years occasionally when the then presiding officer did first lay resolutions upon the Calendar before the Senate. But it is very clear to my mind that the better practice is, and certainly there is nothing in the rules of the Senate that forbids it, to receive resolutions that Senators may desire to offer within the morning hour, and when that business has been concluded then to lay before the Senate the resolutions which have been offered on a previous day and laid over under objection.

Mr. FRYE. There is not the slightest difficulty about receiving these resolutions by unanimous consent. Under the old rules the regular formula on presenting bills was, "I ask leave to introduce a bill." Under the new rules that is not necessary, because there is a rule providing that bills shall be presented at such a time. All that a Senator has to do when this order is called is to ask leave to present a resolution. The Chair will say, "There being no objection, the resolution will be received." I do not think there is any practical difficulty about it.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator see any difficulty in the rule as it stands in the Chair's receiving the resolutions that Senators may choose to offer after the introduction of bills and joint resolutions?

Mr. FRYE. I do not; but if the Chair felt constrained by former rulings to adopt a different course all that the Senator from Kansas has to do is to say, "I ask leave to present a resolution."

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; but that is not the point. I do not want to introduce the resolution by unanimous consent. I want to introduce it because I have a right to do it unless somebody objects. Therefore I hope we may have some exposition of the rule which will make it proper for a Senator rising in his place to offer a resolution because he is a member of this body and has a respectful resolution which he desires to offer.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to move this order:

Ordered, That until otherwise ordered the Chair shall proceed with the call for resolutions to be newly offered before laying before the Senate resolutions which come over from a former day.

The Senate can at any time rescind the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that an order be made that before the resolutions which have been objected to on a previous day, and which lie over, shall be presented to the Senate the call shall be made for "concurrent or other resolutions."

Mr. INGALLS and others. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that is the pleasure of the Senate the Chair will so understand it, and will conform his conduct to that rule. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

RAILROAD LAND-GRANT SETTLERS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PLUMB. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with the names of all settlers and a description of the odd-numbered sections of land settled upon by such settlers within the granted limits of each of the land-grant railroads in the State of Kansas prior to the definite location of said roads; also the names of settlers and a description of the lands settled upon within the indemnity limits of said roads prior to the selection of such lands by the said railroad companies; also a description of lands claimed by said companies and heretofore included within the granted and indemnity limits of said roads, but which the records of the General Land Office show to be outside and beyond said limits.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the papers in respect to the claim of Mrs. E. G. C. Abbott be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], which came over from yesterday. The resolution will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate under and by what authority a so-called State Legislature has been organized in the Territory of Dakota, if such a body has been organized as alleged, and by what warrant or authority said organization has proceeded to elect Senators to this body. And that said committee inquire further and report whether said organization is not calculated to bring about a conflict of authority prejudicial to the good order of said Territory and demoralizing to the Territorial government legally organized and administered under the authority of the National Government, and that said committee have leave to report any special matter relating to the affairs of said Territory requiring or demanding the attention of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, ordinarily I should not deem it appropriate to discuss a resolution of inquiry, but the resolution proposed by the Senator from South Carolina suggests an inquiry into matters of which, as I shall presently show, the Senate is already fully advised; and, in the second place, it contains, by suggestion, a reflection upon a body of the American people as patriotic, loyal, and law-abiding as any that are to be found within the limits of our National Government, not excepting those who abide under the palmetto trees of South Carolina.

This resolution has already been the occasion of some newspaper discussion. A sample of the treatment that the people of Southern Dakota are receiving at the hands of the Democratic press of this country I find in the issue of the New York World for to-day:

The bogus South Dakota Legislature, now in session at Huron, has enacted the farce of electing two judges—Moody and Edgerton—United States Senators for the alleged State of South Dakota. This is one way, we presume, of forcing recognition, but a poorer plan for breaking into the Union could hardly be devised—

May I pause to suggest, Mr. President, that even this unfriendly critic takes notice of the difference between an attempt to break into the Union and an attempt to break out of it?—

in fact it is a question whether in setting up a bogus State government the impatient Territorial politicians are not guilty of some sort of constructive treason.

That, I take it, is the implication of the resolution which is now before the Senate. I would not discourage, whether in the press of the country or in any Senator here, a sensitive disposition toward treason. I think we can not too early take notice of incipient rebellion nor too severely condemn it when we have once fairly located it.

But in addition to the distinction which I have already made in the interest of my Dakota fellow-citizens, that this attempt of theirs is an effort to break into the Union and not to break out of it, I shall undertake to show that it is respectful toward the Government of the United States in the manner of it, deferential to the Constitution and Government of the United States in every step of it, orderly, decent, and conformable to precedents which the Senators on the other side of the Chamber at least ought to respect.

Mr. President, there is no need of a committee of inquiry. It is not necessary that we should look after facts or summon witnesses. All that has been done by Dakota for the last six years in her efforts to secure at the hands of a reluctant Congress the recognition of the full rights of her people as American citizens has been done in the light of open day. There have been no conspiracies, no cabals, no midnight assemblages, no mustering of conspirators in the shadows of the wood.

Let me very briefly review the history of the attempt of Dakota to secure admission as a State of the Union. Two questions are involved. First, the question of the division of the Territory upon the forty-sixth parallel or some other convenient line. The Legislatures of Dakota, in their annual assemblies, and the annual conventions of both of the great political parties in the Territory have for six years been representing by resolutions to Congress that the best interests of the people of that Territory require a division. Upon the question of the right of South Dakota to admission as a State the Legislature, large popular conventions held in different parts of the Territory, and influential committees of her ablest men have made their representations to the Congress of the United States.

At the last Congress the Senate passed an enabling act authorizing the people of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel to organize a State government. The measure received no attention from the House of Representatives. What has been done since that time? The Territorial Legislature of Dakota, made up of representatives from the entire Territory as now organized, passed an act authorizing the assembling of a constitutional convention for South Dakota, for the purpose of framing a constitution to be submitted to Congress as the basis of its admission to the Union of the States. This act is in the libraries of Congress, a public act passed by the Legislature and approved by its governor. I take it that neither the Senator from South Carolina nor any other Senator here will desire to put a committee to the trouble of finding that law and bringing it to his attention.

What was done under the law? The members of the constitutional convention were chosen at a popular election, of which due notice was given. A convention, consisting of over one hundred delegates, assembled on the 4th of September last at Sioux Falls, and set about framing a constitution for the proposed State of Dakota. I am not sure whether there has been formally submitted to us the journal of the proceedings of that convention, though a copy of it is in my possession, but an engrossed and certified copy of the constitution adopted has been presented to the Senate through its presiding officer.

What further steps were taken? That constitution provided that a Legislature should be elected and should assemble at Huron, or at a point designated by a popular vote as a capital for a new State, which was Huron, and that they should do certain things.

In order that we may know exactly what the Legislature, whose existence is questioned, whose assembly is called to our attention as a possible menace upon the national authority, was authorized by the constitutional convention to do, and that we may get the spirit of that convention in its relation to the Government of the United States, I will read the last section of the schedule attached to the constitution:

SEC. 32. Nothing in this constitution or schedule contained shall be construed to authorize the Legislature to exercise any powers except such as are necessary to its organization, to elect United States Senators, to provide and pass means and measures necessary, preliminary, and incident to admission to the Union, and to assemble and reassemble and adjourn from time to time; neither to authorize any officer of the executive or administrative departments to exercise any powers of his office except such as may be preliminary and incident to admission to the Union, nor to authorize any officer of the judiciary department to exercise any of the duties of his office until the State of Dakota shall have been regularly admitted into the Union, except such as may be authorized by the Congress of the United States.

There is the concluding section of the Dakota constitution. It contains the fullest recognition of the authority of the National Government. It stays the hands of each department of the new State government proposed to be organized until Congress shall recognize the work of the constitutional convention and by a proper law admit Dakota to an equal standing among the States.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Indiana by what authority that organization proceeded to the election of United States Senators before Congress had acted upon the question?

Mr. HARRISON. I will come to that presently, and I will show the Senate that Senators of the United States elected under precisely similar circumstances have stood at the door of the Senate waiting for admission until Congress had passed upon the question of the admission of their States.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator will be able to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has not read up on this subject or he would not have introduced this resolution. Whatever may have been the differences between the great politicians of the past there was practical unanimity among the Democratic politicians in the case of Tennessee, California, and Michigan as to the right of States to proceed as far as Dakota has proceeded.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that while he is seeking information and asking the Committee on Territories to inquire whether there is not danger that this formative and tentative State organization in Dakota may come into conflict with the national authority, this very constitution in the section I have read, breathing the most thorough submission to the authority of the General Government, has been authoritatively laid before this body.

Mr. BUTLER. Where? I have never seen it, I must confess. In what form, let me ask the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. It was laid before the Senate in the form of an engrossed and certified copy of the constitution, presented by the President pro tempore and referred to the Committee on Territories, of which the honorable Senator is a member.

Mr. BUTLER. At what time?

Mr. HARRISON. Four or five days ago.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought it had not been done very long. Certainly the Committee on Territories has had no meeting since that paper has been referred to it, that I remember.

Mr. HARRISON. It has had no meeting at all at this session. It will assemble to-morrow for the first time. I am glad to know that the Senator from South Carolina was ignorant of this provision in the constitution of Dakota when he framed his resolution, and I am willing to believe that if he had known that it was there he would not have suggested such an inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that. My resolution is one simply of inquiry, and I must express very great surprise that the opposition to it comes from the Senator from Indiana, who is chairman of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Unless the Senator chooses to state it I can not understand the ground of his surprise; for I know nothing more appropriate than that the chairman of the Committee on Territories, to whose care the appeal of the people of Dakota has come and been intrusted by a reference of the Senate, should meet at the very outset an attempt to put upon them the stigma of having inaugurated a movement in hostility to the Government of the United States. I am not willing that it should wait until the committee can make inquiry and report. I think justice to them should be done now—at the earliest possible moment.

Mr BUTLER. Mr President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken if he supposes that I intended to put a stigma upon anybody. This form of resolution is one very usually adopted in the Senate, and is one of inquiry simply; and if it should turn out that it was a proper proceeding on the part of the people of Dakota nobody will be more gratified than myself. I therefore think the Senator is working himself into a passion entirely unnecessarily and charging me with purposes which certainly did not enter my mind.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not in a passion. The Senator has never seen me in a passion or he would be able to discriminate. More than that, I am making no special charges; but I ask the Senator from South Carolina if any Senator had risen upon this floor and offered a resolution directing a committee of this body to inquire whether some proceeding taken in the State of South Carolina was not inimical to the Government and hostile and treasonable if he would not have resented it at the very outset?

Mr. BUTLER. I think it very doubtful if I should, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator better than he knows himself.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it very likely that I should not have objected to it. That kind of a resolution has been introduced in this body and has passed; and I say to the Senator now and here, that if at any time in the future he feels called upon to introduce a resolution of that kind he shall have my most cordial support.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I repeat, I know the Senator better than he knows himself.

Mr. BUTLER. Possibly

Mr. HARRISON. I know how often and with passion he has risen at the very faintest suggestion even of an election impropriety in the State of South Carolina—an accusation, of course, which could not possibly carrry any weight with it, and yet he felt it necessary to meet it very promptly.

Mr. President, I have shown that this State organization in all its departments, by the terms of the constitution adopted and under which only it can act, is staid, and that its attitude here to-day is that of entire deference to the Constitution of the United States, of respectful submission to the national authoriry, and one of entreaty to the Congress of the United States to do what is just and right for the semi-disfranchised people of that Territory. That is their attitude. Why move an inquiry? They have laid all the facts before us; every step in the progress of the affair has been officially communicated to this body.

But now, Mr. President, is there anything disorderly in the method which they have adopted? I have here in this same document, the memorial which accompanies the copy of the constitution, addressed to the President and Congress of the United States, a respectful memorial, full of arguments and statistics in the interest of Statehood for Southern Dakota. Let us see how it begins:

The people of that part of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude, having adopted a constitution republican in form and taken the necessary preliminary measures toward organizing a State government, now through their properly constituted agents present such constitution to the President and Congress of the United States, and confidently relying upon the rights which pertain to American citizens like circumstanced, respectfully but earnestly pray to be admitted as a State into the Union of States.

So they come. The Senate is advised of their attitude, for this memorial has been laid before the Senate; and yet we are asked to inquire whether the steps they have taken are not in derogation of the authority of the United States.

Again, from the same memorial I read the concluding paragraph as I have read the introductory one:

The people of Dakota invoke these guaranties to let a stronger light in upon the injustice of which they complain, by the neglect of Congress, in failing to give them precedent authority to organize a State government, and that Congress may see with clearer view the justness of their claims to admission.

For the granting of the request herein your memorialists, the people of Dakota, will ever pray.

That is their attitude here, Mr. President. But is the course pursued so unusual or unprecedented in the history of the admission of new States to our Union that it should have suggested the inquiry contained in this resolution? Does the Senator from South Carolina recollect the case of Tennessee?

Mr. BUTLER. Perfectly well, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator remember that in that case there was no enabling act? Does the Senator recollect that the Legislature of Tennessee notified the General Government that on a particular day the Territorial government in that Territory would cease? Does he remember that? Does he then also recall the fact that the Democratic party insisted upon the formality and regularity and propriety of the organization of the State of Tennessee?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, Mr. President, this is not a question of the Democratic or Republican party. The Senator has been trying to give that direction to his observations from the time he took his position on this question. It is a matter of not the slightest consequence to me now what the Democratic policy in the past has been or what the Republican policy. I offered the resolution in perfect good faith, and to anticipate precisely what happened when Michigan applied for admission to the Union.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not think that there was any bad taste in that reference of mine, for while I hope the Senator and his colleagues can be brought to consider this question of the right of the citizens of Dakota to admission among the States upon the high platform of statesmanship and in the pure air of patriotism, it has unfortunately been so in the past that the divisions upon the question of the admission of Dakota in the Senate have been party divisions.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that division has been brought about very largely by the instrumentality of gentlemen like the Senator from Indiana. That is my opinion on that subject. I think they might have presented here a scheme fair and liberal and according to fair statesmanship under which there would not be the slightest difficulty on the subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is hope in what the Senator has said, and I trust, as a member of the Committee on Territories, that the fair, just, and righteous basis upon which Dakota may be admitted to her rights will be suggested by the Senator in committee, and that if a majority of his associates on the committee should disagree with him he will not content himself simply with opposing or criticising our scheme, but that he will promptly propose one of his own and put us to the test whether we are not ready to accept any fair bill on this question.

Mr. BUTLER. Whatever might be my intention on that question, inasmuch as the Senator has assumed the entire championship of the people of Dakota, I prefer that he should make that suggestion.

Mr. HARRISON. Ah, Mr. President, in taking that position the Senator retires, and he extinguishes that gleam of hope which shot up over the dark horizon when he made his first utterance. He declines to have anything to do with the people of Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. I have assumed no championship. I only wish it were conformable to the usages of the Senate that Dakota could speak for herself here.

In the case of Tennessee—and I do not want to detain the Senate by much reading—I read from Hough's American Constitutions:

As a measure preliminary to State organization, a census was ordered July 11, 1795, which returned a population of 66,650 free persons and 10,612 slaves, and an expression of the voters taken at the same time gave a return of 6,504 for and 2,562 against the formation of a State government. A convention elected for preparing a State constitution met at Knoxville, January 11, 1796, and the next day a committee of two from each county was appointed to prepare a constitution. A bill of rights was reported on the 15th, and a frame of government on the 27th, by Daniel Smith, chairman of this committee. Their labors being completed, on the 6th of February an engrossed copy was read and passed. On the 19th an engrossed copy—

And this I ask the Senator's attention to—

On the 19th an engrossed copy was forwarded to the President, with a notification that on the 28th of March, at which time the Legislature would meet to act on the constitution, the temporary government established by Congress would cease.

That was the attitude of Tennessee. They organized their constitutional convention, framed a constitution, assembled their Legislature, and sent their constitution to the President and Congress with a notification that on a particular day the Territorial government of the United States would cease.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator think that a proper way of getting into the Union of these States?

Mr. HARRISON. No, Mr. President; I was only distinguishing between this way of Tennessee and that of Dakota, showing how much more conformable to good reason and propriety the proceedings in Dakota are.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator to say that he does not approve of that method adopted by Tennessee.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not approve of this message sent to Congress that the Territorial government would cease at a particular day.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator approve of the method by which Tennessee was admitted?

Mr. HARRISON. I approve it fully; it is according to established precedents, and, as I believe, to the Constitution, that the people of a Territory may assemble and organize a constitutional convention and a State government, and if they come with that organization and submit it to the judgment and approval of Congress and do not assert in it anything against the national authority, I say it is orderly and constitutional.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator go further and state that that body, call it legislature, convention, or whatever you please, has a right to set up a government in conflict with the government maintained by the National Government in the Territory?

Mr. HARRISON. I have been endeavoring to show the Senate that none such has been set up. There is no intention to set up a State government of that sort. If it is attempted it will not meet my approval.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator if he would take the same position if the Territory of Utah were to form a similar organization and adopt the policy which seems to have been adopted by the Senator's friends in the Territory of Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. Whether I would take a similar position?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Precisely.

Mr. BUTLER. Or any other Territory?

Mr. HARRISON. Any Territory in the world; of course I mean appurtenant to the United States. But I reserve the power to Congress to act on their constitution and to decide whether the conditions are such that they should be admitted into the Union of States.

Mr. BUTLER. But this organization goes a step further and assumes to legislate, to collect taxes, to elect judges—in other words, to exert all the functions of a complete State, as I understand.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is wrong, as the concluding section of the constitution must satisfy him, if he will reread it. They have collected no taxes. They have elected judges and Senators, and they have said to them all, "You shall not exercise the functions of your offices in the smallest particular until Congress has approved the bill for our admission into the Union." That is the distinction, I would say to the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Then what is the necessity for such a proceeding on the part of the people of Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a preparatory work. It is one of two recognized ways. There have been twelve or thirteen instances in our history where States have been admitted without any enabling act, under a constitution formed by themselves by a popular movement and submitted to Congress. It is just as orderly a method as the other, though we may have our preferences between the two.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to call the Senator's attention to a pronunciamento which appears to have been issued by Mr. Hugh J. Campbell.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. If it would suit the Senator as well when I get through the reading of the Tennessee case, I would rather get through that and hear what he has to say afterward. It breaks the connection of my remarks.

I finish the extract from Hough's American Constitutions:

This notification, with accompanying documents, was received by the President February 28 and laid by him before Congress on the 8th of April.

I believe at that time Washington was President—I do not see the date here—but notwithstanding the announcement, which seems to be a little impolite if not revolutionary, that the Territorial government would cease at a particular time, it was not treated as a disrespectful communication, but was by the President laid before Congress with the accompanying documents.

The claims of the new State for admission were not recognized by all, but after an energetic discussion the bill became a law on the 1st of June, 1796. The principal grounds of opposition were, that the proceedings had not been authorized by an enabling act of Congress; that the census, being taken by those most interested in showing a large return, might be liable to error, and that it belonged to Congress alone to decide whether one or more States should be formed in the ceded territory, and to establish the time and manner of organization. The Constitution of 1796 was not submitted to the people for ratification. It was considered by Mr. Jefferson—

I call attention to his opinion as given here—

It was considered by Mr. Jefferson as the least imperfect and most republican of any that had then been adopted, and it remained in force without change nearly forty years.

That is the history of the admission of Tennessee organized by a popular movement calling a legislature into existence, notifying the Government when they would put that State organization into force, and sending their message in the form I have described. They were admitted by Congress as a State into the Union.

The cases of Arkansas and Michigan are instructive, because the Senator from South Carolina will recollect that this was in the old slave days, when the States were paired for admission; when on the one hand there was opposition to the admission of a slave State and on the other opposition to the admission of a free State, and there was generally a good deal of convention and arrangement by which two were put together, in order that the equality of the States, slave and free, might not be disturbed. Arkansas and Michigan were thus bunched for admission. What was the case in Arkansas? Arkansas had no enabling act, and in discussing the question of the admission of Arkansas Mr. Adams, speaking upon that subject, expressed the same view as to the guarantees of the Louisiana treaty. May I stop right here and say that the people of Dakota are entitled not only to the benefit of the provision in the treaty with Louisiana, which expressly stipulated that this territory should be divided and organized into States, but they are also entitled to the guarantees and provisions of the ordinance of 1787, which have by acts of Congress been extended over the territory west of the Mississippi River?

Mr. BUTLER. Now, if it does not disturb the Senator, I should like to ask him a question in this connection.

Mr. HARRISON. I pause for a question.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there anything in the authority which he has just quoted which authorizes the citizens of South Dakota, as it is called, to carve out a part of that Territory and organize it into a State, and leave the remaining portion of the Territory unprovided for?

Mr. HARRISON. There is nothing at all in the way of authority. There is nothing binding. The people of any part of an organized Territory of the United States may take these proceedings. They can not divide an established Territory without the sanction of Congress, but they can propose such a division just as well as they can propose anything else.

Mr. BUTLER. But I understand they have divided the Territory of Dakota and have assumed the functions of a State in one part of that Territory by an arbitrary line which they themselves drew without the consent of Congress, settling for themselves the boundary line of the State which they propose shall be admitted into the Union. I will ask now if the Senator can cite a single precedent in the history of this Government which authorizes any part of a Territory under the jurisdiction of the General Government to carve out a State to itself?

Mr. HARRISON. The case of Michigan was just such a case.

Mr. BUTLER. In the case of Michigan the controversy——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. BUTLER. One moment. I only desire to make one suggestion in that connection. In the case of Michigan the controversy was between the State of Ohio and the State of Michigan and the State of Indiana as to the boundary lines; but the people of Michigan did not succeed in the attempt to carve out a part of the Northwest Territory and say, "This shall be the State of Michigan." Congress had something to say about that and did prevent it, and the State of Michigan was admitted into the Union, as the Senator has suggested, by way of compromise, and only by way of compromise, and for the purpose of preventing bloodshed and revolution. It was distinctly stated by the statesmen of that day that that was the object of their votes.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope there was no such grave contingency at that time as the Senator suggests; but I have in my hand Cooley's work, entitled "Michigan," in the "American Commonwealths" series. Let me read a paragraph to the Senator:

At this time Michigan was enlarged by the addition of the territory west of the Mississippi and north of the Missouri, as far west as the Missouri and White Earth Rivers, and counties were laid out in that distant country. But the people were now becoming earnest in their desire for State government. A census was ordered in 1834, which showed that there were within that portion of the territory which by the ordinance of 1787 was to constitute one of the five States 87,278 inhabitants, considerably more than were necessary to entitle it to admission as a State in the Union under the compact. Congress was, therefore, memorialized to set off the western territory from Michigan; and in anticipation of compliance the people west of Lake Michigan were allowed to name one of their own number for a Delegate in Congress. In April, 1835, an election was held of delegates to a State convention for forming a State constitution, and this convention met at Detroit in May and agreed upon a constitution, which was submitted to the people and approved by them in October.

At the time Michigan took this step this outlying western territory was attached to her and part of her Territorial organization, as I understand and as this authority seems to show very clearly, and in organizing a State government Michigan did not undertake to organize for the whole Territory then known as Michigan Territory, but selected a portion of that Territory and organized for it a State government.

I had begun to read an extract from John Quincy Adams, taken from Benton's Thirty Years' View. John Quincy Adams expressed the same views as to the guarantees of the Louisiana treaty—and I hope the Senator will bear in mind that this applies to Dakota—entitling Arkansas to admission in spite even of her slavery, much as that Massachusetts statesman was opposed to the institution. John Quincy Adams was then the most decided opponent of slavery in the House, and he expressly declared that in his opinion not only the compromise of 1820 but also the Louisiana treaty forbade all opposition to the admission of Arkansas as a slave State. Recognizing the obligation of the provisions in the Louisiana treaty for subdividing that Territory and guaranteeing it admission to the Union, John Quincy Adams overcame his repugnance to the admission of a slave State, and acted under what he believed to be his constitutional obligation.

Mr. BUTLER. He was more honest than some of the modern statesmen on that subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, Mr. President; I was going to make that remark, but as the Senator himself has made it it saves me the trouble.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad I did.

Mr. HARRISON. And we will each make the application. I know where I would lodge it.

Mr. Adams's words were:

She [Arkansas] is entitled to admission as a slave State, as Louisiana, and Mississippi, and Alabama, and Missouri have been admitted, by virtue of that article in the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, which secures to the inhabitants of the ceded Territories all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the original citizens of the United States; and stipulates for their admission conformably to that principle into the Union.

* * * * * * *

It is written in the bond, and however I may lament that it ever was so written, I must faithfully perform its obligations.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 616.

Mr. Hamer, of Ohio, in discussing this question, as reported by Mr. Benton, took this view of the subject:

One of the principal objections urged against their admission at this time is that their proceedings have been lawless and revolutionary—and that, for the example's sake, if for no other reason, we should reject their application and force them to go back and do all their work over again. I can not assent to this proposition. Two ways are open to every Territory that desires to emerge from its dependent condition and become a State. It may either petition Congress for leave to form a State constitution, and, when that permission is given, proceed to form it, and present the new State constitution for our approbation; or they may meet, in the first instance, form the constitution and offer it for our approval.

There is no impropriety in either mode. It is optional with Congress at least to admit the State or not, as may be thought expedient. If they wish to admit her, they can do it by two acts of Congress; one to authorize the formation of a constitution, and the other to approve of it when made; or by one act, allowing the prayer of the petitioners to become a State, and approving of their constitution at the same time. This latter course is the one adopted in the present case. There is nothing disrespectful in it. Indeed, there is much to justify the Territory in its proceeding. Year after year they petitioned for leave to form a constitution and it was refused, or their application was treated with neglect.

Wearied with repeated instances of this treatment, they have formed a constitution, brought it to us, and asked us to sanction it, and admit them into the Union. We have the authority to do this; and if their constitution is republican we ought to do it. There is no weight in this objection, and I will dismiss it without further remark.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 634.

In that connection I wish to offer a brief extract from the speech of Mr. Buchanan on the Michigan case. I believe Mr. Buchanan was in charge of the bill for the admission of Arkansas, and Mr. Benton in charge of the bill for the admission of Michigan. Mr. Buchanan said upon the Michigan case—and I quote again from Benton's Thirty Years' View—

I think their course is clearly justifiable; but if there is anything wrong or unusual in it, it is to be attributed to the neglect of Congress.

That may be said here with equal force.

For three years, they have been rapping at your door, and asking for the consent of Congress to form a constitution, and for admission into the Union; but their petitions have not been heeded, and have been treated with neglect. Not being able to be admitted in the way they sought, they have been forced to take their own course and stand upon their rights—rights secured to them by the Constitution and a solemn, irrepealable ordinance. They have taken the census of the Territory; they have formed a constitution, elected their officers, and the whole machinery of a State government is ready to be put in operation; they are only awaiting your action. Having assumed this attitude, they now demand admission as a matter of right; they demand it as an act of justice at your hands. Are they now to be repelled, or to be told that they must retrace their steps, and come into the Union in the way they at first sought to do, but could not obtain the sanction of Congress? Sir, I fear the consequences of such a decision; I tremble at an act of such injustice.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, volume 1, page 629.

Upon the question of the admission of Arkansas the vote in the House of Representatives was 143 to 50; in the case of Michigan 153 to 45. In the case of Michigan there was an absolute overturning of the Territorial government. They set up their State government; their State judges held courts; their governor assumed the executive functions of the State; their Legislature made laws, not during the first winter, for while they assembled that year they awaited the action of Congress, and did not assume to enter into general legislation; they did not put their State government into full operation in all its parts until Congress at that session refused to admit them to the Union. Then they did, and the Territorial government of Michigan was absolutely wiped out, and had no existence in fact as a de facto government.

I believe the Territorial governor, or the secretary who was acting as governor, became State governor.

It is worthy of remark that Andrew Jackson was President at that time. Andrew Jackson knew secession and nullification at sight, and he had the courage to proclaim against it. But as to the State of Michigan, though all these steps were taken, there was no proclamation from the President of the United States, there was no suggestion that this was revolutionary; and when he transmitted to Congress the papers in connection with this case, so far as I recollect, there was no word of censure. But I do not propose to defend the action of Michigan in going so far as was done in that case. I would not suggest to the good people of Dakota that they should attempt to set up any State government and put its officers in the exercise of their functions until they have received the sanction of Congress.

Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate longer. In the case of Oregon there was no enabling act. In the case of California there was no enabling act. The case of California is instructive, because as appears from a reference in Mr. Benton's book the Senators were actually elected by the State Legislature, and were here waiting to be sworn in before Congress took action upon the constitution of the State of California and admitted the State.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I think he is taking an unnecessary amount of trouble, so far as I am concerned, in citing authority about which he and I certainly will not differ. There is one point on which I desire an investigation by the Committee on Territories, and if it would suit him I should like to read an extract from what I styled a while ago the pronunciamento of Mr. H. J. Campbell, who seems to be the prime mover in this State organization. I should like to read it now and ask his opinion of it.

Mr. HARRISON. I will not deny the Senator the privilege of reading it now if he wants to, though it breaks a little upon the order of my discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. I certainly will not disturb the Senator, but here is what I understand Mr. Campbell to proclaim——

Mr. HARRISON. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. BUTLER. It is from a pamphlet prepared by ex-Chief-Justice P. C. Shannon, of the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. Is Mr. Shannon opposing the admission?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know; I am not able to say upon that subject.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not had the pleasure of seeing that pamphlet.

Mr. BUTLER. He is evidently opposing this so-called State organization I judge from what he says. Mr. Shannon quotes Mr. Campbell to this effect:

Mr. Campbell says:

"We have the undoubted authority to meet in convention and to adopt a constitution. The same being ratified by the people, we have the right to elect State officers, to provide our own courts, to collect taxes, and to manage our own affairs. Should the provisional organization provided by the General Government refuse to recognize the government provided by the people, such refusal would not in any degree affect the legality of that government. Should Congress delay the admission of our representatives for the time being, that act would not take from us the privilege of governing ourselves here at home.

* * * "We are therefore in favor of immediate State organization."

Further on down, Hugh J. Campbell offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Resolved—

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator inform me where that resolution was offered; in what body?

Mr. BUTLER. The pamphlet speaks of Mr. Hugh J. Campbell and of some convention at Yankton or Sioux Falls or some place.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps the Senator had better examine the pamphlet and be able to locate the place and know whether it was in town meeting or in the constitutional convention.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think it makes a particle of difference.

Mr. HARRISON. Nor do I. It is simply the expression of Mr. Campbell's views.

Mr. BUTLER. I think a town meeting has about as much authority to do what has been done by the so-called legislature as the so-called legislature had to do what it has done.

Now, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to read one other extract and ask if it meets his approbation; I read Mr. Campbell's resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the people of Yankton County, and we so advise the delegates to-day nominated, that it is the unquestioned and lawful right of the people of Dakota, south of the forty-sixth parallel, to at once establish for themselves a State constitution and a State government, and that we recommend the constitutional convention at Sioux Falls to submit to the people for election, at the same time that the constitution is submitted, a full list of offices [officers?] for a complete State government, a State Legislature, and a Representative in Congress.

That I understand to be the spirit behind this movement. Now I should like to ask the Senator if that meets his approbation.

Mr. HARRISON. What force does the Senator himself give to the utterance of an individual who was connected with this movement in some popular convention or county meeting in advance of the assembling of the constitutional convention—what force does he give to that against the deliberate action, the unanimous action, of the convention, saying that that thing should not be done? I never thought there was much force in bringing in a letter or a statement of some individual when the question is, What is the attitude of an organized movement which has expressed itself as this body has in the constitution submitted? That is Mr. Campbell's view. I repeat again that if Mr. Campbell or anybody else proposes, much as I sympathize with the heat and indignation and sense of injustice which the people of Dakota must feel at being kept out of the Union—I say much as I sympathize with them in all that, I would not advise them to put this State government in force without the sanction of Congress.

Mr. President, I will omit the extract to which I referred. Mr. Benton says that in the case of Mr. Gwin and Mr. Frémont, Senators from California, they were here waiting, and immediately after Congress acted upon the constitution which the people of California had adopted and admitted that State they were led to the desk of the President pro tempore and sworn in as Senators. They were here waiting to be sworn in as Senators from a State that was organized only by a popular movement within itself, to which organization Congress had not given any sort of sanction in advance. So then, Mr. President, I conclude——

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Indiana will permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. The State which I have the honor to represent was admitted to the Union without any previous enabling act; the State officers were elected before the State was admitted; Senators were elected—Democratic Senators—the Hon. Henry M. Rice and General James Shields; the first Senators from Minnesota were here, and took their seats after the State was admitted; a Democratic State ticket was elected with General Sibley as the first governor of the State. The State was admitted without an enabling act or any authority from the General Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Admitted into the Union without any enabling act?

Mr. McMILLAN. Without any previous enabling act.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that Minnesota was admitted to the Union without an enabling act by Congress?

Mr. McMILLAN. The people of Minnesota adopted a constitution and elected a complete set of State officers and United States Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from South Carolina does not understand the Senator from Minnesota. An enabling act, technically so called, is an act passed in advance of holding a constitutional convention.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says in the case of Minnesota there was no such act.

Mr. BUTLER. No authority from Congress, in other words, to organize a State government?

Mr. HARRISON. None whatever until the people came here with their constitution and Congress sanctioned it. I have not examined the precedent, but I have no doubt the Senator from Minnesota is right in what he says.

I have just had it suggested to me—and that is the disadvantage of listening to extracts from a paper with which you are not familiar—that the resolution which the Senator from South Carolina has just read as having been offered somewhere by Mr. Campbell was offered in the constitutional convention of Dakota and was voted down. That being so, ought it to be used here? I am informed that is the fact.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MANDERSON. The resolution that was read by the Senator from South Carolina was presented at a meeting of the people of Yankton County. I wish further to call his attention to the fact that the language read as the language of Mr. Campbell is not his language, although it is attached to a pamphlet issued by Judge Campbell, but is an editorial from the Press and Dakotian, printed in Yankton, and the editorial article was published on the 29th day of May. I have it in my hand.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply read that extract from Mr. Campbell to show the animus by which he was actuated, stating at the time that I had been informed that Mr. Hugh J. Campbell, late of the State of Louisiana, was the prime mover in perfecting this organization in the Territory of Dakata, and was at the time, if I am not incorrectly informed, a United States district attorney; and it was he who swore in these so-called members of the Legislature. That was the purpose I had in reading it.

Mr. HARRISON. If I were inclined to impute motives I think I could find some evidence of unfriendliness toward Dakota in what the Senator has said. I have shown him here what the convention said. I have shown him a section, the last one in the schedule, unanimously adopted, prohibiting the State government from exercising any of the functions of government until the State is admitted, and yet he comes here to say that he understands somebody who was a member of the convention said so and so, and that what he said is to be taken as the spirit of the convention rather than its official vote unanimously passed.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought the Senator had been quoting from the opinions of gentlemen all the morning in vindication of his position.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, Mr. President, but I have read opinions that were afterward crystallized by a majority vote in the Senate and House of Representatives and became precedents.

Mr. BUTLER. So have I, sir. It seems that the opinion of Mr. Campbell was crystallized by the organization of this Legislature.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will himself recognize presently the unfairness of that, and I will not urge it further; that is, that the expression of a single individual shall be brought here, and he shall say to the country and the Senate that that expression uncovers the springs and motives of this movement in this constitutional convention, though that expression is directly in the face and teeth of a deliberate article of the constitution unanimously adopted by that body. I submit there is no force in that sort of reasoning or suggestion.

And now, Mr. President, to conclude—for I have detained the Senate longer than I intended—I thought at the outset, when this resolution was proposed and the character of comment to which I have alluded was going about the country, that instead of waiting for any inquiry by the Committee on Territories it was due to these people that I, as the chairman of that committee, should endeavor briefly to set before the country something of the precedents in this case, and also to make it apparent from the Constitution itself that the people of Dakota were proceeding in respectful deference to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. President, unless there shall be further debate upon this question, I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senator from Illinois desires to address the Senate on this question to-morrow. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the bill in regard to the Presidential succession.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from South Carolina if he desires to obtain the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I was just going to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if it is entirely agreeable to him I would prefer that the resolution for the present be not referred to the Committee on Territories, as some observations may be submitted upon it.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator from Illinois not now in his seat desired to say something on this resolution, and would like to have it stand over until to-morrow for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 471) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, and inability both of the President and Vice-President.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I should not venture to take any part in this debate at this stage of its consideration by the Senate when the subject has been so fully debated at previous sessions in the years 1881 and 1882 if my interest in and my investigations into the subject had commenced with my acquaintance with the action and proceedings of the Senate. But having had occasion professionally heretofore to give a very thorough examination into the constitutional provisions and to the natural and necessary workings of the provisions one way and the other that should be adopted by Congress to meet the exigency which is now presented for its action, I have thought that it was on my part at least reasonable that I should present the views thus formed. It is quite true that they concur in result and the means by which the results of reasoning on the subject are reached with those that have been presented on one side and the other of this Chamber which apparently are to receive the assent of the majority of this body; and that, if it were the only consideration that should guide me, would lead me to interpose no interruption, even of a half hour's consideration, of the action upon the bill.

The amendment before the Senate relates exclusively, as I understand it, to that portion of the present bill which provides for the continuance in the discharge of the duties of the Presidency of the officers designated under this law in its preceding part who are to assume and execute those duties; and I should confine myself entirely to the latter branch of the subject were it not for the general considerations that in my mind have made it a necessary conclusion to me upon the text of the Constitution itself that the succession provided by this measure is not only entirely constitutional, which is admitted I believe on all sides, but is the only possible constitutional exercise of the very limited power that is accorded by the Constitution to Congress.

There are two general propositions, I think, which all students of the Constitution will admit without question. One is that in the frame of the office of President and its origin of authority from the direct action of the people in a channel marked out by the Constitution, the purpose plainly expressed and written all over the action of the Constitution in this very matter was that Congress shall not participate either substantially or circumstantially in the election of the President of the United States. I then think it will be found generally impressed upon the Constitution, I would say imbedded in the Constitution, that periodicity and accommodated and adjusted periodicity in all the action of the great departments of the Government except the judicial, is not to be treated as circumstantial or only of convenience and propriety, but that it enters into the very scheme by which the election of President by the people without the aid and without the control and without regulation by Congress possible was provided, and it carries with it that the President is to come upon the scheme of the election and this arrangement of periodicity with a concurrent and attendant action of the people on the other branches of election. I believe it is essential in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution, I believe it is embraced in the firm provisions of the Constitution, that a newly elected President, as he is fixed upon a periodicity of four years, is to come into power and assume the reins of government with a concurrence of periodicity in the election of the lower House of Congress.

I believe therefore that the inference from the mere nomination of the period of duration is not the essential idea for the Presidency or for the lower House of Congress. It is that when this whole frame of government was launched into action and became the operative government of the people of the United States, it was understood by the framers and is written in the provisions of the Constitution that after the initial date of this periodicity was fixed, it was predetermined that it was not to be disturbed and that this synchronism of the action of the electors of President and the voters for the House of Representatives was not to be disturbed.

But it is said that while all that is so in purpose and intent, and while the gravity and importance of that adjustment can not be disparaged and has not been disparaged, yet there is no connection impressed in the Constitution in terms upon the actual calendar as established by our working system. It is true that the Constitution of the United States as originally framed and under which the Government was set in motion does not refer to the 4th of March or any stated period as the initial step in the periodical rotation, but ever since the adoption of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution the 4th of March appears as one of the dates fixed in the Constitution that can not be changed in the matter to which that relates, however much you may certify the period of election otherwise. The twelfth amendment provides that the time and opportunity of the House of Representatives to intervene in the juncture prescribed for the election of a President is limited and determined by the succeeding 4th of March. The alternative presented by a failure of the electoral colleges to present a President is devolved then, as we all know, upon a particular frame and adoption of the action of that body upon the House of Representatives; and if that function is not observed and executed within a certain limit of time in electing a President of the United States, then an alternative arises for the action of the Senate, which then, but not before that period, can elect a Vice-President, and thus provide a successor for the term that is thus left vacant.

> And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

Under this periodicity that we have spoken of this firm line of demarkation between the liberty and power secured to the House of Representatives and the line upon which the Senate shall succeed with its authority the 4th of March is fixed; and if the calendar be disturbed by this new election of President then there may be an interval when the House will have a much longer period than was contemplated by the arrangement of this Government as fixed in the Constitution for exercising its option of choosing or not choosing a President, and the Senate will be left expectant in an indeterminate form for a very considerable time, for the Senate can not proceed to furnish a Vice-President who can take the place until the period within which the action of the House of Representatives is possible shall have expired.

It is true that an inconvenience of this nature in the actual provisions of the law of 1792 regulating the period for election has not actually arisen in practice; but the argument is that the Constitution meant to fix it, and did not leave it to Congress to determine whether there should be an accommodation to this circumstantial consideration; nay, it did not leave it to Congress to determine in the face of an exigency that they would provide, pro re nata, for the occasion, whether there should be an election or not. That would be by Congress an open breach in the main fortress of the Presidency, that the people should maintain it entirely out of the intervention of Congress. That is broken down by the proposition that the Constitution left it open to Congress to determine whether or not an election should be held; and, if so, when and under what circumstances of date, under what circumstances of haste or of protraction, this election should be ordered. In other words, whatever general and wise law might be adopted that should ameliorate the interruption of succession in the disturbance of the working of the Government as little as possible was fastened in the hands of Congress and was open to repeal or modification, and repeal or modification in close proximity to and in the near actual contemplation of the political situation of the country as betweeen parties that should incline it to have an election or not have an election as an election would be favorable or not favorable to one or the other party of the country. I need not say that in these suggestions concerning political methods and political action of political men and political bodies I am not casting an aspersion upon either men or the constitution of the bodies. The bodies are political, the men are political, and the Constitution recognized both these facts, and determined that the lines of the Presidency should be drawn free from, not open to, any circumstantial invasion of the method for the establishment of the Presidency.

Now, with these propositions, which I think must be recognized, let us see by recurring to the few clauses in the Constitution which have the least reference either to the original election of President or to the provision for the catastrophe by which the source of authority and the proceedings of election have been frustrated by the intervention of death or disaster or removal of the President or the Vice-President acting as President and being President—let us see whether there is anything in the actual provisions that interferes with or reduces in the least the proposition that Congress is not intended by the Constitution to meddle at all in the Presidential election. It will be found that so far from carrying such an impression as that the power was meant to be given, they show that it was carefully guarded against ex industria. So it is on every proper construction, legal and constitutional, of the narrowest and the best-defined power accorded to Congress when any exigency was supposed by irregular and undesired and unexpected derangements, Congress should need to be appealed to.

In the first place, in regard to the election itself, as we all know, the President came independent of Congress, and as there might be some pretension and some necessity that circumstantial authority might be claimed by Congress and the claim might be enlarged by constitutional construction, the language is firm that—

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

In other words, the Constitution determines that the votes shall be cast on the same day. That the Constitution protects; and what does it say about it? Merely that the time of choosing electors and the day of the electors' voting may be regulated by Congress. There is the sole intervention possible to Congress in the election, and that firmly excludes every argument in favor of circumstantial arrangement or modification.

There is but one other clause as to any power of Congress respecting the subject of the Presidency in its constitution, and that is for the concurrent misfortune that shall attend the constitutionally elected President and Vice-President. Now, notice here the equal apportionment and reservation in the Constitution, by which it was fixed in advance what could be accorded and what should not be in the power of Congress even in the especial contingency suggested. If, instead of doubting whether this or that conclusion may be inferred in clauses of the Constitution by its expression or by its limit of expression, constitutional lawyers and those charged with legislative action in obedience to the Constitution would submissively and carefully weigh what the wise, sagacious, circumspect, patriotic framers of the Constitution had in their minds and in their language had definitely expressed, thereby we should have much less of loose discussion about whether this or that might be found in the Constitution or in the acts of Congress. This body was filled with the purpose that Congress should not meddle with the original constitution of the Presidency. They had thrown every guard about that. They had precluded on all sides by insurmountable barriers that this protection of the Presidential source of authority should not be interrupted by Congress. They saw that their contrivance against the contingencies of life and health and of political disturbance leading to the action of Congress by impeachment and conviction might not always be effectual; and with all that in their minds they undertook to leave Congress to provide for this one emergency. They shaped it in every way they could shape it, leaving open only what they could not provide for; that is, an elective successor to fill a vacancy in a term.

In the case of disability that should affect both the officers elected Congress may do what? It might be said that they might elect. It might be said that they might provide for an election. It might be said that the first officer of state should be authorized by Congress to assume the power. What did the Constitution say? "Congress may by law provide"—provide what? Provide "declaring what officer shall then act as President," and these words that I have read are the be-all and the end-all of what the Constitution has intrusted to Congress. "By law" it may "provide." It can not wait to provide as a mere emergency for the occasion, treating it as they might desire, but "by law" it must be provided for, in which law the President of the United States must concur. It limits it by exclusive words in our language and in our law. There is the distinction between announcing and enacting, between the power of selection and the power of declaring; and that was to carry out the purpose of the framers of the Constitution, that Congress should have by settled law (changeable, of course), which had received the concurrence of the President of the United States, power to declare "what officer shall then act as President," and then on that designation Congress exhausted the power; and the Constitution itself declares what the consequence shall be of that declaration, which is all that is open to Congress.

Now the Constitution resumes its authority: "And such officer shall act accordingly"—that is, discharge the duties of President—"until the disability be removed;" which is one of the occasions for the action of Congress, and the other occasion, the alternative occasion, when the office is vacant, "or" in that case "a President shall be elected." And when the Constitution stops there, and does not provide for Congress the right to determine whether there shall be an election or when there shall be an election, and the power of the Constitution asserts itself as disposing of the whole question, when Congress has made its declaration of the officer and the Constitution has prescribed what shall ensue, it is then fastened upon the power of the officer; that is, if he takes the place to perform the duties by reason of disability, the Constitution says he shall hold it for the disability. Does any one pretend that Congress could order an election during a temporary disability, during a constitutional disability, whatever that may be? By no means. Here then is an exhausted power. It comes then to the alternative, the vacancy, however it may have occurred. There it provides that the duties of the Presidency shall be executed until the election of a President; and what does that mean? It means an election that the Constitution provides for; it means what the framers of the Constitution knew and recognized as a condition that was to follow. That is, the whole frame of the periodicity of the Constitution, and that frame which protects the office against innovation from Congress is maintained in all respects and always. And you will find that all the mischiefs which have threatened and all the difficulties which have given rise to debate among eminent statesmen and eminent lawyers as to there being any doubt and therefore difficulty come from not reading the Constitution as meaning what the framers meant—meant by them intelligently—and what they were undertaking to provide for, what at least they meant to maintain, that whatever in the unforeseen vicissitudes that should attend the life of a great nation might occur, they meant this principle at least should last, that Congress should not say whether or not there should be an election or when there should be one, but should do what? Exactly what the framers of the Constitution did not undertake to do and did not feel themselves competent to do.

They had made a reasonable provision for the vicissitudes of life; they had made a reasonable provision for the emergencies of political excitement by impeachment and removal. Unless there was a designated succession by persons that were to proceed from the electoral college, unless there was to be, so to speak, a provision of a larger number of Vice-Presidents who would take the place in the failure of succession (which was not reasonable and was not suitable), they had no choice but to leave in that emergency the situation to be provided for by Congress in the second, the third, the fourth, or the fifth vacancy that might take place. But the moment you have acted in that direction then the certainty is fenced in the frame of the Constitution, and the officer designated is intrusted with the execution of the powers that would have devolved on the constitutionally elected Vice-President if he had succeeded to the Presidency.

So then in my humble judgment, fortified by the views expressed by colleagues on this side and on the other side of the Chamber, fortified by commentary, fortified by the action and the argument of eminent successors to the framers in all the divisions of political parties on this question, I find at last that we simply wander into difficulties that our fathers had left open to us as they thought, when by understanding the purpose of the Constitution we should have seen that no expatiation and no argument to meet these difficulties was imposed upon the wisdom or the discretion of Congress.

In case the Vice-President fails, under the vicissitudes named, to take his place, then the Constitution says what the consequence is to be. Here there are to be considered two subjects; first, whether it is desirable that the succession should be placed where since 1792 it has been lodged, but where it has never been exercised, in the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House. I will not repeat any of the views of expediency, both of the higher and of the lesser weight in this matter, when the vacation of office is created by a power higher than human will; but I must submit that when one of the alternatives of vacating the office depends upon the will of Congress in its two branches, then to say that the framers of this Constitution, who meant to keep hands off by Congress from the election and determination of the Presidency, in that event actually opened it to them to substitute a successor, one that was to emerge from their own body by their own election, and was to take and fill the vacancy that had been created by the will of the two Houses of Congress—what say you of the wisdom of providing for one of these officers to succeed in the Presidency when the place was to be made for him by the impeachment of the House and the sentence of the Senate? Is that according to the circumspection and the precaution of the framers of the Constitution? I apprehend that I can readily satisfy you, as I have myself, that on the plan of the Constitution they left it not possible to either of the two Houses of Congress to allow the successor in the Presidential office named by Congress to take the place where Congress itself had been the accuser and judge to vacate it.

Now was it not a very precise way used by the framers of the Constitution when they said that all Congress could do was to declare what officer should fill the place? Did they not mean an officer of the United States? They certainly could not name an officer of a State, much less an officer of a foreign state. An officer of the United States unquestionably was meant; and then, having in their minds that Congress should not meddle with the constitution of the Presidency, they saw when they limited it to an officer of the United States that they excluded a Senator and a Representative, because in the same Constitution, using the same phrase, not pointed to any particular circumstance of this kind, there was this provision touching the question who could by possibility and who could not by possibility be an officer of the United States:

> And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

You have not only shut out the two Houses from meddling with the Presidency, but you have shut out the members of the two Houses from any possible succession, because they can not ever be officers of the United States. Can it be supposed that the framers of this Constitution, so circumspect and so sagacious, left this loop-hole for the Presidency that you could vacate it yourselves and fill it yourselves?

I need not refer to the other clauses of the Constitution that have been insisted upon, and usefully and wisely, in the argument. I think when I read this Constitution in these clauses I have a right to feel that the great men who framed it knew how to write it as well as I know how to read it.

Now look at the difficulties. Let me suggest one, that the President's office being vacated and the Vice-Presidency being vacant, then the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the present arrangement is, becomes the person to discharge the duties. It is an annexation to this old and important position, no doubt, of President of the Senate or Speaker of the House, as the case may be; but if either of them stays here the Constitution has said he shall have no office and can not be chosen an officer. Then is the discharge of the duties of President a new office? That seems to be settled in the general judgment. What then does the present arrangement do with the decision, and I think the sound constitutional decision, that a Senator or a member of the House of Representatives is not within the impeachment clause of the Constitution?

The President is named; the Vice-President is named. Both of them are officers; and, ex industria and to guard against the notion that their dignity is such that they should not be included in the list of impeachable officers, they are specially named. The only persons who are open to impeachment under the Constitution are the President, the Vice-President, and all civil officers. Military officers are not under it. No one who does not come within the designation of a civil officer is impeachable. The Senate having decided in Blount's case in 1798 that he was not open to impeachment, what is your constitutional position when you have got a Senator who is discharging as an annex to his office the duties of President? Is he open to impeachment? If so, how do you expose him to impeachment? He is not named as President, he is not named as Vice-President, but the duties are annexed to the place that he fills in the Senate as a member or in the House as a member. He is not open to impeachment in that capacity. Thus by this, which I must regard as a sedulous scheme departing from the precise line of the Constitution, you are actually involved in the condition of making a man not subject by the Constitution to impeachment execute all the offices and duties and powers of the President.

I have said all that I need to say on the subject of the line of succession. To my mind no one can support under this Constitution and the construction of it the deposit of this power in an officer only of the Senate, and not of the United States; an officer only of the House of Representatives, and not an officer of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution.

Now, in regard to what happens in case of a designation by Congress by law declaring the successor; then as to the question whether Congress can proceed any further and say he shall discharge it only so long—he shall discharge it only till this or that event or circumstance; he shall discharge it until an election that the Constitution has named or defined—let us look at that a moment. Let us see whether this is a technical construction of the language of this clause that I refer to. There are two conditions in regard to the situation of the Presidency where Congress may be called upon and has been empowered by the Constitution to act.

I need not enumerate or further repeat the three conditions under which the office may be vacant—removal, resignation, death. That is a vacancy in the Presidency; that is one situation, and the circumstances under which it arises need no further attention from me. But there remains another condition for the Presidency in which the office shall be full, constitutionally full, not to be touched at all. There is a President of the United States, but by the infirmities that attend all, great and small, an interruption of health, mental or physical incapacity occurs, creating a situation incompatible with the exercise of the duty the Constitution has reposed in him. Then is the naming of a successor exposed to any judgment or any rapacity to be exercised by the two Houses? No. They can only name the officer to fulfill the duties during that disability (which is the antithesis of ability), to provide for that case, which is an ordinary condition, not of deposition, not of possible impeachment, not of possible condemnation in the height of party excitement, but a disability from providential interference, recognized and submitted to; but Providence has not vacated the Presidency, and there must then be a substituted execution of the duties just as long as that disability shall last, never possibly to be interrupted by an election.

Why, then, should we be so eager to understand that when there was a vacancy the framers of the Constitution were not satisfied to have the Congress name a man who was fit, an officer, to take what was left of the term of the Presidency to be filled out? I do not understand why it can be supposed that the framers of the Constitution, having two alternatives laid before them and undertaking to provide by a disjunctive for the one and for the other, and neither of them has anything to do with Congress, Providence having struck its blow upon the President, he still filling the office, allowed Congress to take charge of the vacancy by death or removal and make it possible to derange the synchronism of our whole scheme of government.

Nay, more than that, sacred duty requires that it should not be construed to have been left at the option of Congress to say whether the office was vacated or not. They did not leave it for Congress declaring the officer, so that where they were satisfied with him they would repeal the law and not order a re-election or otherwise resort to an old law for an election and a successor, or you please that the two Houses of Congress or the people of the United States, if they should find out what did please them, could then order a re-election. No; let us understand that this business of filling at the will of Congress the Presidency or omitting to fill it for this or that length of time is not circumstantial, but is at the very bottom of the propositions of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I think I have, however little they may be entitled to consideration, presented my views to the members of the Senate. For myself, I find here a statute to put on the book, if this bill is enacted, that in both respects of succession and term of office of the successor is conformed to the absolute language of the Constitution and the necessary purpose and scheme of its provisions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I quite agree with my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. EVARTS] in the admiration he expresses for the wisdom and the sagacity and the foresight and the patriotism of the framers of the Constitution; but I do not agree that they attempted to withdraw from the States of this Union and from its people represented in Congress any connection that possibly could be withdrawn from the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States. On the contrary, the Constitution, as it explains itself to me in its plain language, declares that in the very first contingency, in the very first step in an election of President and Vice-President after the States have acted, Congress is called upon to be an important actor and factor in the great drama of political government.

The President of the Senate of the United States, be he a pre-existing Vice-President or be he the daily choice of the members of this body, like our present President of the Senate, is to be the sacred custodian of the electoral votes. On a certain day thereafter he is to open and display those votes in the presence of both Houses of Congress, the political representatives and embodiment of the whole power of the States and of the people. Then the votes are to be counted and the result declared by somebody; it is not necessary to go into the question of how or with what effect here, because it does not touch the question we have now under consideration.

Then I find that those wise and sagacious men provided that in case of any failure of a choice as to the President the House of Representatives shall choose him; in the case of a failure of choice of Vice-President the Senate of the United States shall choose him; and if the House of Representatives shall not have elected a President then that Vice-President under the Constitution elected by the Senate becomes the Chief Executive of the nation. That is the Constitution as I read it. It is the Constitution as the very fathers who framed it, members of the First and Second Congresses many of them, understood it when they provided by the act of 1792, which we now to-day review and think was amazingly erroneous, that the President of the Senate of the United States, if there were one, or the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the lower House, if there were not a President of the Senate, for the time being should carry on the Government until a new President should be elected.

I repeat that in those very first Congresses, having in them members of the constitutional convention familiar with the whole tendency and spirit and letter of the scheme, composed of men as wise and as patriotic as the members of the convention who framed it, in the light of their then recent experience and discussions in the constitutional convention, in the eyes of all the people of the United States, proceeded deliberately, first in one session and then again in another (because it was not finally acted upon at once), with every one of these aspects of the question before them, discussed and suggested just as my learned and distinguished friend has discussed and suggested them—only of course not with the scholastic and forensic ability that he possesses—deliberately determined that the Congress of the United States had the power under its Constitution not only to provide that the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House should carry on the Government until an election could be had, but also to provide that a new election in the case of a vacancy in both these offices should be had immediately; and no man questioned—some one or two in the debate, I believe, as the old books tell us, hinted what my friend has so stoutly maintained now—that it was open to question whether a new President and Vice-President could be elected in a case of vacancy until the four years had come around; but the great drift of the debate, receiving the assent of everybody who divided as to where the practical choice should be as between the Secretary of State and the President of the Senate, with the consent of everybody dividing upon the questions, the great merit in that bill for such a contingency which might arise was that it provided for a speedy and immediate new election by the States and the people, as the Constitution provided, of a President of the United States.

Were these men deluded? Did they not understand the scheme that they had just then framed and were putting into operation of their own Government? Were they not patriotic enough to believe that the great source of all power in the people and in the States formed by the people and composed of the people was to be resorted to at the earliest moment possible when their choice had failed of its due execution by a vacancy occurring in both these offices? They said so and they provided so; and I repeat (because I wish to have it clearly understood what our fathers thought) that on every side, differing as the House of Representatives did largely on the question of the practical choice between the Secretary of State and the President of the Senate, on this question of an immediate election of a new President and a new Vice-President everybody agreed that it was the great merit and the chief merit and the safety of the scheme that this great power should not be devolved upon anybody longer than the possible necessities of time and circumstances should compel it. Here is the proof of it, here are the Annals of Congress, here are the Debates. I shall not take your time to read them over.

Is it possible to suppose that our fathers who were so wise in framing the Constitution became so ignorant and so dull the moment they undertook to execute it and to carry on the Government that they had so wisely framed? Had they exhausted all the intellect and the patriotism that they possessed in framing an instrument which they had not capacity to understand when they had once got it or the will to carry into execution a scheme of government for a free people? I do not think so.

It was suggested by two gentlemen, as my friend has to-day suggested, that neither the President of the Senate nor the Speaker of the House of Representatives was an officer, and then the Constitution which we both admire so much was read to those two gentlemen where it said that the Senate shall have power to choose a President pro tempore and their other officers—I may not quote the language exactly, but that is the substance of it—and those gentlemen were asked (just as is done in debates nowadays) to explain what that meant if it did not mean that the President of the Senate was an officer referred to, recognized, named in the Constitution of the United States.

Whether you call him a civil officer, or a military officer, or a theological officer, or whatever kind of officer, is not of the least consequence to this question. The Constitution had referred to him and named him as the holder of an office that the Constitution had itself authorized to be created and had created and authorized the Senate of the United States to fill. There was an end of that debate then.

The House of Representatives naturally (and human nature is the same to-day that it was almost a century ago and has been since this law has stood) thought that it was a scheme of the Senate to magnify its importance and to get the President of the Senate, being as they then understood, as we do now and as we have declared by formal resolution of this body, subject to the changing will of the representatives of the States from day to day if they choose to change—a scheme of the Senate to take the control of the Government into its own possession until a new election could be had; and so at first a majority of the House of Representatives adopted by four or five or six majority—a small one too—an amendment fixing, instead of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of State—precisely the measure that is now before us.

Mr. HOAR. As far as it went.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As far as it went. I save taking up time. Yours is much better, to provide for further accidents, of course much better; but they substituted the Secretary of State by a small majority. They sent that bill to the Senate, no question arising on the other parts of the bill further than I have stated, in regard to the immediate new election, which everybody appeared to regard as indispensable to the true idea of republican and constitutional liberty. They sent it with that amendment to the Senate. The Senate disagreed. The House of Representatives on a reconsideration receded from their amendment and agreed to the provision as it stood in the Senate bill and as it stands to-day in the law, of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I am not going to take up your time, sir, to discuss the practical question as to whether it is more convenient that the Secretary of State and so on or the President of the Senate should carry on the Government. I said all that I wish to say about that yesterday, but I only desire to say in reply to my honorable friend from New York that so far as the scheme of the Constitution goes as explained and expounded by the men who made it at that time, not only in the constitutional convention but in the two Houses of Congress when immediately the question arose of the execution of these powers, they agreed on all hands that it was within the competency of Congress and it was its imperative duty to provide that there should be an immediate election when vacancies occurred; and I repeat that was without any essential dissent on any hand, however much the two Houses and the members of the two Houses may have disagreed as to the convenient practicability of having one officer or another officer hold the reins of Government until a new election could be had. Everybody agreed that one must be had and should be had at the earliest possible moment.

That is the way the history of these transactions stands, and now for a century almost has stood that law which the fathers who made the Constitution enacted, when it was fresh in the minds of them all as to the purpose and spirit and intent of its letter and its scope and its scheme, that we now propose to hold has been an entire mistake, and that there is no competency under the Constitution to provide for electing a new President if both the offices get vacant. I can not read the Constitution that way, Mr. President. If I am right in supposing that the Constitution of our country does authorize us to provide by law for a new election of President, then will any man who believes in a government of the people deny that it is wise to come to a new election, as our fathers provided, as soon as it possibly may be done?

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I desire a single moment. To go to the constitutional argument, I do not consider that because in the Constitution certain duties have been imperatively and definitively carried to this or that branch of Government it is an argument against the position that the framers of the Constitution and the Constitution itself did not intend to carry to the Houses of Congress any discretion in the exercise of their duties.

In regard to the count of the Presidential vote, that is devolved on the Vice-President, we will say, without discussing what that means; but the Constitution puts it there. It did not leave it for Congress to put it there or withhold it, nor to qualify it, nor to limit it. So, too, on the devolution upon the House of Representatives it was defined and imperative both what they could do and when they could do it and how they could do it, and they did not act then as any portion of Congress in the instructions reposed upon Congress as Congress. It was to avoid calling the electoral colleges together again or to require a reinstitution of an election that by a rough simulation to the electoral system and the source of the Presidency springing from the people it was devolved on the existing representatives in the House of Representatives as a convention of the States, in that form and by that action. Their quality in that action was not as members of Congress or under the powers conferred upon Congress. It was accepted and adopted as a convention of the States employed to do what Congress should not do, but which must represent the States by the people, and had recently been chosen within the term.

Thus you will see my proposition is that whatever the Constitution reposes in regard to the Presidency it reposes within its own limits imperative and definite, and it is not open either to decline or to exert the power. The Senate's President can not decline the count of the Presidential vote; the House can not decline the election of a President. I mean in obedience to the Constitution. All can disobey the Constitution.

So, when we come here, Congress does not choose a Vice-President. It takes the office of Vice-President that holds only the aspect, so far as the Presidency is concerned, of expectancy provided by emergency, in order that Congress need not meddle with the succession so far, but he has also some duty and some function in the Government to preserve in the Senate. Then by the emergency that the Constitution can not provide for in the actual election of the third successor or the second successor, if you call the Vice-President the first, it says to the Senate, you may choose, as you have a right to choose, a President of your body, and you may then choose the Vice-President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. HOAR. Have the yeas and nays been ordered upon it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 1, it is proposed to strike out

"sections" and insert "section;" in the same line, after "one hundred and forty-six," to strike out "one hundred and forty-seven, one hundred and forty-eight, one hundred and forty-nine, and one hundred and fifty;" and in line 4 to strike out "are" and insert "is;" so as to read:

"SEC. 3. That section 146 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest there may be some Senators now present who were not here yesterday, I will explain in a single word that this amendment if agreed to leaves the law to stand as it is now, providing for an early election of President and Vice-President of the United States in case both offices are vacant. The committee recommend to repeal the law so that upon whomever the administration of the office may devolve he will hold it until the expiration of the regular term.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER], but yesterday I transferred the pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and the pair of the Senator from New Jersey stands for the Senator from California, but I do not see the Senator's colleague here. Perhaps I had better observe the pair and withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if I were not paired.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN], who is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I see that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is now present. I record my vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Aldrich,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Teller,
Blair,	McMillan,	Plumb,	Vance,
Cameron,	Mahone,	Sewell,	Vest.
Cockrell,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Conger,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Spooner,
Edmunds,	Morrill,	Stanford,

NAYS—37.

Allison,	Cullom,	Harrison,	Pugh,
Beck,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Ransom,
Berry,	Eustis,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Jackson,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Frye,	Jones of Arkansas,	Walthall,
Butler,	George,	Logan,	Wilson of Iowa,
Call,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Wilson of Md.
Chace,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Oreg.,
Coke,	Gray,	Morgan,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Platt,

ABSENT—18.

Bowen,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Sabin,
Camden,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Payne,	Van Wyck.
Fair,	Kenna,	Pike,
Hale,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stated the other day that I was considering the question of the wisdom of moving as an amendment to this bill the provision for regulating the count of the electoral votes, just as the founders of the Constitution in the First Congress provided the two schemes together then; but yielding to the opinion of gentlemen in whose judgment and good intentions I have the greatest possible confidence, I shall not offer that amendment. I merely make this explanation as showing why I do not.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, it was not my intention, until the rejection of the amendment just acted on by the Senate, to make any remarks upon this bill. I should have voted in favor of the bill with that amendment, but I do not feel at liberty, with the amendment rejected, to vote for the bill.

I believe the people are at all times to be trusted with the choice of the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It is a principle which I regard as a very sacred one; and my confidence in the people of this country to choose their rulers is unabated. The framers of the Constitution in providing for the emergency which is contemplated by the proposed act provided expressly that the vacancy should exist only until a President should be elected. I do not believe they intended that language to prevent the people from choosing a President at the first suitable occasion.

The people have made no choice of a Secretary of State or of any of the members of the Cabinet designated in the bill to discharge the duties of President. They have never had an opportunity of selecting in any way the officer who may be called to that responsible position; and yet the emergency may arise at the very commencement of a Presidential term, and during all the remainder of the term the duties of the President of the United States are to be executed by a person who has not been chosen by the people of the United States, a person who is a mere appointee of the President, as one of his own counselors. I do not believe that any danger can result to the institutions of this country by permitting the people to have the opportunity of selecting a President when an emergency of this kind shall occur, if it ever should occur.

I am not at liberty, with the amendment rejected, to vote for the order of succession which is provided in the bill. I much prefer that the law as it exists shall remain upon the statute-book, and that the succession shall not be changed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I shall not enter upon a discussion of this bill. I withheld my assent from the third section. I recognize a popular demand for some legislation upon this subject. I have not recognized any popular demand for the third section of the bill. I do not believe the public attention has been called to it, and I am confident it will not meet with public approbation. To me at least it is objectionable.

I do not share with some who have already spoken upon this subject the fear of a popular election. I am a believer in the doctrine that the oftener we go to the people, the source of power, the better it is for national affairs. I do not believe it was contemplated by the early founders of the Government that any person selected in the way these officers are to be selected should discharge the duties of the executive office except for such a short time as might be necessary to secure a popular election; and because of the adoption of the third section by the Senate I shall be compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and regret that it was rejected. But I see no constitutional objection to the bill as it stands, and there has been so much reproach, I might say justly, showered upon the Congress of the United States for neglecting to provide for the emergencies here contemplated that I am compelled to vote for a bill that I might criticise so that this reproach may no longer be justly placed upon us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the next business in order, which is the proposed joint rules.

Mr. HOAR. As I see that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is not present, I move to take up the next bill in order, the judicial salaries bill, allowing the joint rules to be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 6) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the pending question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. 3. That the first section of this act shall only apply to judges who are hereafter appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to be disposed of in a few minutes, and not have it called up every day.

Mr. COKE. I am informed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama will not be disposed of in a few minutes. We have a good deal of executive business, and I adhere to my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas insists on his motion.

Mr. HOAR. I hope it will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will waive his motion for one moment, I merely wish to say that I supposed there would not be much further debate on the bill; but if there is to be debate on it, I understand it is the general desire of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to have an executive session, and therefore I shall not insist on the bill further.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

JOINT RULES FOR THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the resolution providing for a code of joint rules for the two Houses of Congress, so as to have it left as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules proposing a code of joint rules.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

The Senate having ordered the publication in the RECORD of nominations to office by the President, beginning with the commencement of the present session, the following list is presented:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 17, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to have printed at this time, and that it lie on the table, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States defining the office of Second Vice-President of the United States.

The joint resolution was read at length.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire to object to the introduction of that proposition at this time, but as I have one that relates to the same subject, I would ask consent to have it go with the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that both of these propositions when regularly introduced in the House would be referred to a committee of the House—the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DIBBLE. Undoubtedly, that is the intention.

Mr. TUCKER. And I see no reason why they should have precedence in this way over other measures that gentlemen want to introduce in the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. The only object in view is to have the joint resolution printed for the information of members of the House.

Mr. TUCKER. Such matters can be printed when they are introduced regularly under the call.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not mean to precipitate action upon the House in receiving and referring such matters, but since this has been introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina, if it goes into print I ask the same privilege for a similar proposition.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think we had better have the assembled wisdom of the House if we are to have it at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] objects, and neither proposition is before the House.

THE RULES.

Mr. MORRISON. I call up the unfinished business. In doing so I would be glad to have some understanding as to the time when the general debate is to close. I ask unanimous consent that it be closed at 3 or 4 o'clock this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up for consideration the unfinished business, which is the report of the Committee on Rules, and asks unanimous consent that the debate under the hour rule be closed at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. CASWELL. I hope that will not be done. I have the impression that there are several gentlemen on this side of the House whose turn will come about the hour named, and who are very anxious to be heard.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to saying 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the arrangement to have been made heretofore that after the debate under the hour rule shall have been concluded the debate under the five-minute rule as in Committee of the Whole shall be allowed.

Mr. CASWELL. That does not meet my objection.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand there is to be debate as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] reserves, as the Chair understands, the right to move the previous question on any amendment.

Mr. MILLS. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the proposition to have been made the other morning, and assented to by the gentleman from Illinois, that after the debate under the hour rule shall have concluded there might be debate under the five-minute rule on the clauses and amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois to cut off the five-minute debate at all.

The SPEAKER. Nor does the Chair so understand.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to take this opportunity to make a statement as to my own relations to the time permitted. Yesterday in asking an opportunity to be heard I found that my colleague [Mr. STORM] had precedence in the list at the Speaker's desk, and it was suggested, as he desired to speak but a few minutes and as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] was to speak in his hour and said he wanted but ten minutes, there would be about half an hour for me. But circumstances took such a course, my colleague not wishing to speak at so late an hour last evening and the gentleman from Massachusetts being indisposed or having for some other cause left the Hall, that instead of being the third speaker in the hour I came to the front. It has been suggested to me within the last two or three minutes that it is expected two other gentlemen will speak within the hour. That was not my understanding. My understanding was that there were from twenty-five to thirty minutes to be taken out of the hour and I was to have the remainder. Under that arrangement I desire to speak; but I do not desire to speak with the understanding that I am to skip out at any point when it is thought convenient to let four other gentlemen come into the hour and take two-thirds of the thirty minutes given me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, has nothing to do with the arrangement which gentlemen on the floor may make among themselves as to the distribution of time.

Mr. STORM. I wish to say it was understood this hour now running for debate was given to those opposed to the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. STORM. When I was at the Speaker's desk, in the presence of my colleague [Mr. KELLEY], I understood the Speaker to put my colleague down on the same side. I understand since that he proposes to speak on the other side of the question. I do not think it fair for him to take away one-half of the hour allowed me to parcel out between myself and my friends in opposition to the view my colleague proposes to take.

Mr. KELLEY. If I said anything indicating the side of the question I was to speak upon, what I indicated was my strong desire to support that provision which proposes to prohibit riders on appropriation bills, which have been the agency by which the powers belonging to the House have been absorbed by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was asked by the Chair with a view to a distribution of time which side he desired to speak upon, the Chair understood the gentleman to say he was opposed to one of the propositions, which the Chair understood to be that one relating to the distribution of appropriations; and as that has been the chief matter of controversy on the floor, the Chair put the name of the gentleman on the list as opposed to the report.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I have been misunderstood, and I retire for the present and take such chance as I can hereafter to get the floor.

Mr. STORM. I will give my colleague fifteen minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not disposed to enter into a scramble for the floor. Will my colleague agree that I shall have fifteen minutes after other gentlemen have spoken in the hour?

Mr. STORM. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. All right.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress made in that work during the last fiscal year; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STORM. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have practically settled the "weightier matters of the law" in this matter, and are in some danger of thrashing too long the anise and mint and cummin. I am not at all certain that I can add anything to this debate except general suggestions. It does occur to me to say that there has been a good deal of emphatic declamation about propositions on which we are all agreed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] in his able speech of yesterday asked us whether we propose to submit to a rule which robs a majority of Representatives of their rights, or whether we are willing to commit ourselves to the doctrine that a majority of the House can not be trusted. As I heard him repeat this over and over again, I almost felt that my liberties had been taken away, until on cooler reflection I remembered that not one man in the House would dare say a majority of the representatives of the people can not be trusted, and that not ten men in the House believe that a majority of the representatives of the people can not be trusted. Shivers almost ran down my back as I listened to the peroration of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] when he referred to the Siberian despotism of the Russian Czar and the blood and iron hand of Bismarck; and it was only on later reflection that I remembered we are American citizens, in no danger of becoming Russian serfs, and that nobody on this floor proposes that we should be brought to that condition.

I agree with gentlemen here who demand the largest liberty for the people and the largest parliamentary freedom for the representatives of the people. But I have also been taught that liberty is of little value except as it is regulated by law, and I have learned that general parliamentary rights are of little value except as they are regulated by necessary parliamentary rules. There is only one way in which we can have on this floor that ideal liberty which seems to be in some gentlemen's minds; that is, by abolishing all parliamentary rules, by abolishing all committees with their preferences and their privileges, by abolishing all restrictions upon debate, all limitations of time, and remanding ourselves to the condition of a debating society. But nobody proposes to do that. Everybody recognizes that the necessities of public business require certain rules, certain preferences, in the transaction of business. The gentlemen on this side of the Hall, before this Congress met, gathered in this Hall and nominated as their leader the gifted and distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. He was made, not a tyrant or a despot, but a parliamentary leader upon this floor. Great power was confided to him, power which he will use conscientiously and faithfully, but which also, from the necessity of the case, he will use to facilitate some business, to delay and defeat other business; and we shall probably at times fret under his direction and leadership. Indeed, we are constantly recognizing the necessity of trusts of power, and the true philosophy is not to destroy but to regulate them.

The simple question before us at this time is whether, having agreed upon the reform measures that are necessary to cure abuses in our system of rules, we shall go further, and take from the Appropriations Committee the bills which have heretofore been in its charge and distribute them among some eight or nine other committees; whether these bills shall be confided to one committee or distributed among a number, with the friction and delay thereby resulting, and also with the possibility of tyrannous combination; for the chairman of each one of these committees will be be a leading member of the other side of the House, and combination can be used at any time to cause delay, to renew abuses, and if need be to obstruct the fortunes of the minority on this side of the House.

I yield to no member in my criticism of the abuses under which we have been suffering. I find that that system of abuses arose under the revision of the rules which was adopted in the Forty-sixth Congress; and the general tendency now seems to be to slough off the shackles then imposed on us and go back to the freer and more generous system prevailing prior to that time. But going back to that time I find that under that better system the appropriation bills were not distributed among various committees but were left in the hands of the Appropriations Committee. So that, even if we go back to that better system, relieving ourselves from the fetters which the Forty-sixth Congress put upon us, we shall still preserve the system of giving jurisdiction of all the appropriation bills to the Appropriations Committee. That has been the invariable practice from the beginning of the Government; and the burden of proof rests upon those who claim that a change should be made, not upon us who say that no sufficient reason exists for making a change.

What is the great evil under which we have been suffering? I was a member of the last House. For the short session I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but not long enough to become wedded to it, certainly not long enough to become blinded to the extraordinary power that was in its hands and the abuse of that power which arose in its administration. On the contrary, I am heartily in favor of this revision which the Committee on Rules have placed before us, in its length and breadth, up to but not including this one point of distributing the bills which have heretofore been entirely in the hands of the Appropriations Committee. The evil, if I may put it in one word, is that we were practically bound hand and foot so completely that substantially there were only three classes of measures which could pass this House: First, those bills which were of such utter insignificance and so little account that by unanimous consent they were carried through, thereby entailing upon a member the humiliation of asking as a favor what as a Representative he ought to have the right to demand, and entailing upon the Chair the ungracious task of making preferences among us; second, those measures which were of such overwhelming necessity that although there was violent opposition, yet if they could command a two-thirds vote they would go through under a suspension of the rules—and we know how very few there were which went through in that way; third, those bills which, by the grace of the Appropriations Committee, were carried through in the form of riders or amendments to the general appropriation bills.

Now, I admit just as cordially as is claimed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that under that system the majority were deprived of their rights and at the same time evaded their responsibility—in short, that it was a complete system of how not to do it. The question is, What remedy then is necessary to cure just this evil but not any other? I am not suffering from the despotism of the Czar of Russia; I am not suffering from the tyranny of any kings here, whether they be the kings of the Appropriations Committee, the kings of the Ways and Means, or the kings of the Committee on Rules, but I want relief from just this difficulty of a bad system. I find it first in so amending our rules that every committee of the House shall have full, fair, and equal opportunity with every other committee to present its business to the House and to have a majority of the House determine whether its measures shall become law or not. That is fair and that is right, and the revision now under consideration accomplishes that result so far as it can be accomplished and it has the hearty assent of us all.

The second thing to do, and this is the key-note of the whole matter so far as the distribution of bills is concerned, is to shear the Appropriations Committee of every vestige of the power of enacting general legislation in the form of riders or amendments to appropriation bills, thereby absorbing and in the absence of other means of legislation actually controlling the action of the House. This evil is further aggravated by the fact that in the Senate an entirely different rule prevails, providing that no general legislation shall be put in the form of a rider or amendment to an appropriation bill. The effect is that the two branches are at this cross-purpose; one, the House, can practically only enact general legislation in the form of riders or amendments to appropriation bills, while in the Senate that is the one way in which no general legislation is possible at all. This has resulted in differences, in conferences, in delays to the last minute, in a final agony, and in an ultimate delivery at which only the three nurses from either side are present and of which nobody knows anything until the general laws are published two or three months after the session ends.

I agree to the enormity and wrong of that system, desire it should be rectified, and give my hearty support to the revision now under consideration in that it adopts the Senate plan, and takes away from the Committee on Appropriations the right to enact general legislation in riders on appropriation bills and as far as possible cures the evil.

There is one step further necessary, because by delay in reporting these appropriation bills business is forced to the close of a session, and the condition of things I have described arises. I would therefore go further, and provide that the Committee on Appropriations in the short session should report all its bills by the 1st of February, and in the long session by the 1st of March. Do that and you will then have accomplished all you can do. I say all you can do, because no human ingenuity, Mr. Speaker, can put a bushel of wheat into a quart measure. But so far as you can accomplish anything in preventing the evils before us the adoption of the two provisions which I have referred to in this revision and of this third rule, which is not in it, will do all that can be done. The business of the House can then be transacted more efficiently, committees will have an equal chance, individual members will have their rights as far as possible, a majority will determine what the House shall do, and the Appropriations Committee will be shorn of its excessive power.

So far so good. But I believe that here we should stop, restoring ourselves to the condition of things in the Forty-sixth Congress before the present rules were adopted. But, as often happens in the rush of reform, it is now proposed to go a step further, to take a step which I believe will lead to additional delay, to the friction of a half dozen committees, instead of the delay of one, to increase the expenditure of the revenue of the nation and to the violation of sound parliamentary principle.

If there is any parliamentary principle which has been well established it is the principle which has the authority of our best parliamentarians, whose names have been already cited in the course of the debate, which prevails in other countries and which has prevailed in ours from the very beginning. That principle is that the various matters of legislation shall be referred to the various committees charged with their subject-matter for enactment into law; but that the appropriation of money for carrying such enactments into execution shall be lodged in one general, large, central Committee on Appropriations, which, in homely language, can cut the garment of Government expenditure according to the cloth of its revenue. Formerly, as has been stated, this Committee on Appropriations embraced matters relating to revenue as well as to expenditure. As Mr. Garfield put it, it was divided into a Committee on Ways and Means and a Committee on Appropriations, standing back to back, but preserving the unity of the old system.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. LONG. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me a few minutes longer.

Mr. STORM. I will yield five minutes longer.

Mr. LONG. But nobody has suggested that the Committee on Appropriations should be still further divided in its functions, until now comes the proposition not to establish eight or nine new appropriation committees, but—for, Mr. Speaker, we might just as well face the facts which are before the House and call things by their right names—to destroy, abolish, and annihilate the Appropriations Committee of this parliamentary body so far as the function of its responsibility for the general expenditures is concerned.

It is proposed to leave it a Committee on Appropriations in name, but to destroy it so far as this, its responsibility for the expenditures for the Government, is concerned. To be sure, it is proposed to leave with that committee a half-dozen bills, but you take away from it six or seven of the most important appropriation bills, and everybody knows that a divided responsibility is no responsibility at all.

The value of a central appropriation committee charged with all of the expenditures is not that it contains better men, not that it contains more patriotic men, or that it contains more competent men, but that it is a committee responsible for all of the expenditures of the Government. For instance, suppose you give to the Committee on Naval Affairs the preparation of the naval appropriation bill. The Naval Committee is equally patriotic, equally competent with the Committee on Appropriations, but the Naval Committee has to do simply with affairs relating to the Navy Department. It is constantly in close alliance and sympathy with that Department. It is responsible only for the expenditures of that Department. Its constant tendency is to carry out as far as it can the wishes, demands, and needs of that Department. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that in that case the Naval Committee would be no check upon the expenditures of the Naval Department, but I do say, and every man's common sense so tells him, that that committee would be no such check upon expenditures as would one contral committee charged solely with all the expenditures of the Government, pressed on one side by the Naval Committee, on the other by the Committee on Military Affairs, in front by the Committee on Pensions, in the rear by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and which was cutting the garment according to the cloth.

Sir, reference has been made during the course of this discussion to the River and Harbor Committee, and some unjust things have been said. That committee is as good as another committee—it is just as patriotic, just as competent. In 1882, however, that committee, then under the name of the Committee on Commerce, put $18,000,000 into the appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors—an unparalleled sum. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss that appropriation. I do not propose to say whether it was too much or too little. It met the disapproval of the President and the country and resulted in a change in the political complexion of this House. Whether that bill was right or not I shall not undertake to say, but I stake my reputation upon this, that if the Appropriations Committee of this House, then under the control of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], had had charge of the appropriations for rivers and harbors that bill would not have carried $18,000,000. I go further and say that if even the then River and Harbor Committee had had charge of the other general appropriations that bill would not have been $18,000,000. I go still further, sir. We had last year a most excellent, able, competent, and patriotic Committee on Rivers and Harbors; at its head a man in whom we all have confidence, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]. Their appropriation bill for harbors and rivers may have been well enough. Whether good or bad I do not undertake now to discuss; but I stake my reputation upon the statement that if that committee had been making appropriations for all the other departments of the Government, as by the way it was entirely competent to do, its appropriations for rivers and harbors would have been from 20 to 25 per cent. less than they actually were. In other words, the moment you distribute your appropriations among various committees there comes an increase of expenditures.

There is another question which lies deeper in this discussion than the question of this distribution of the appropriation bills. We are coming to a question of policy upon which we must declare ourselves. The gentleman from Texas is the only one on that side of the House who has touched the real issue. It touches the fiscal policy of the country. That question is this: The gentleman says that the proper fiscal policy is not to ascertain what our revenue is and expend accordingly, but to find out first what our needs are, what the wants of the Departments are, and then raise revenue accordingly. I do not believe the country is prepared for that policy. I do not believe that prudent men act upon that principle in their business. A man with an income of $5,000 a year needs just as much and would enjoy just as much as Vanderbilt with his twelve millions a year, but he would be assigned to the mad-house if he should attempt to arrange his expenditure on the basis of Vanderbilt's income.

More than that. If we are to adopt that policy, if we are first to determine our expenditures and then raise money accordingly, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] may well look for anxiety among the business men of the country as to the constant fluctuation of our revenue and tariff policy. Nobody would then know how much would be required this year or how much would be required next year. Undoubtedly the truth lies between the two lines of policy. It is wise that we should be able to reckon on stable revenue laws, and that we should be able to count on about so much income for each year and regulate our expenditures accordingly.

There lies this deeper question here than the mere distribution of these bills. It is a question whether this House is prepared to enter upon and whether the country demands that we should enter upon a more liberal expenditure of the public money. Put the question fairly and squarely in that way and I should be very much tempted to set my face in the way of liberal appropriations. But do not disguise the matter. Let us call things by their right names. This distribution of these bills means a policy of larger expenditure. Are you prepared to enter upon that, you on that side of the House who are now in power, or you on this side who are going to be in power? The country, I think, is not yet prepared for it.

Let me refer to one other objection which has been made. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] referred to the dangers which arise from the concentration of power which these bills bring into the hands of the Appropriations Committee. I would like to ask him, by the way, in view of his long service as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether he really believes—I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] put the same question—that the Committee on Appropriations can not do all the work these bills would entail upon them when they are shorn of anything in the way of legislation? I should like also to ask him whether he did not feel, when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and made a record which is very much to his credit for its economy and prudence, that the expenditures were less than if the bills had been distributed to the various committees which do not share the responsibility for the whole expenditure?

But they tell us that if the power of these bills remains lodged in the hands of the Appropriations Committee the result will be its arbitrary exercise in order to defeat or interfere with legislation. I recognize that danger. But I think you will overcome it if you adopt the rule I suggest, requiring the committee to report within a given time. But, sir, that danger inheres in the very necessity of the transaction of our business. That danger arises either from the constitution and nature of the committee, or else from the make-up of its personal membership. If the fault is in the nature and constitution of the committee—if the fact that a committee has precedence in the reporting and consideration of its bills gives that committee undue power to interfere with the transaction of the general business of the House, how do you cure that evil by giving the same power to six or eight other committees? Instead of having one, you have six or seven despots.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] give me five minutes more?

Mr. STORM. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. The Committee on Ways and Means has the same privilege, the same power. Does anybody suggest that we go into the Committee on Ways and Means and distribute its bills; that we give its bills relating to the tariff on wools to the Committee on Agriculture, or its bills with regard to the tariff on woolens to the Committee on Manufactures, and so on? The Committee on Rules is also a despot in this House, if you care to use that expression. It is a committee which has almost absolute power. Offer an amendment for a change of the rules, and, without discussion, without a word, it is referred to the Committee on Rules, who pigeon-hole it and control it. But does anybody desire to divide the duties of the Committee on Rules, to give part of its duties to one committee and another part of its duties to another committee?

Is the difficulty in the personnel of the Appropriations Committee? If it is, Mr. Speaker, then, if you are satisfied of that and are backed up by the sentiment of the House to the same effect, change the personnel of that committee. It is your duty to do it, if the personnel of that committee be the cause of delay and of interference with business. But the difficulty is not in the personnel of the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] tells us that he himself, when chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, used the power which came to him by virtue of that position to interfere with public business and to facilitate the passage of certain bills. No fairer, truer man is on the floor, and if he would use his power in that way, other chairmen, whoever they may be, may be expected to use it in the same way. And yet you are asked to distribute this power and give six or seven chairmen the right to use it to delay business?

Mr. Speaker, we shall have gone far enough when we have secured the rights of the majority and when we have shorn the Appropriations Committee of its power to report general legislation, leaving with them, subject to this restriction, the general appropriation bills, not because they are more competent, but because their responsibility circles the whole limit of the expenditures of the Government, and results in less delay, greater economy, and, I believe, in the maintenance of a sounder parliamentary principle. We are flying from evils, I know. We shall probably, as always happens in such cases, fly to some evils we dream not of; but let us not fly to evils that stare us in the face. It is a first-rate thing to fill the reform bucket, but not to fill it to such an extent that it slops over. [Applause.]

Mr. STORM. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to trespass upon the time of the House in this discussion. But the questions involved are so important and the House seems to be so much divided upon the propriety of the different propositions submitted, that I trust I shall be pardoned for asking the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I address myself to some of the features of this report and the proposed changes in the rules.

I will state in the beginning that I sympathize heartily with the desire manifested on all sides of the House to expedite business as far as possible, and to devise some means by which we can more efficiently transact legislation. The increase of the membership of committees I approve because of the increase of membership of the House since the present basis was adopted.

To that portion of the report which looks to the taking up by the House of bills sent here from the Senate, and to the prevention of delay in considering bills which have been passed by that body, I give my most unqualified assent. There are many other features of the report of the committee to which I think we can give our sanction. But there are two recommendations of that report which I am constrained to say it is not best, in my judgment, for us to adopt. No man appreciates more highly than I do the ability and fidelity of the committee to whom this question was submitted and who have made their report to us; but, after some experience here, I repeat that the two features to which I am about to call attention should not, it seems to me, be adopted.

In this discussion I am no defender of any committee or of any man on this floor; nor do I believe this is a question of confidence or want of confidence in the integrity and intelligence of members of this House. I believe that if you were to select the fifteen members best suited for the consideration of appropriation bills, and then take them out of the House, there would still be fifteen more to whom we could safely intrust all those bills. Ay, more, if we were then to take out that second fifteen there would still be found fifteen, yes, thirty more, to whom we could intrust these subjects with assurances of fair and intelligent results. I believe the members of this House are actuated by an honest desire to do whatever is best for their constituents and their country. It is a question merely of how most effectually to attain the best legislation.

The first question is, Shall we have a committee supervising the expenditures of the Government and knowing what is to be appropriated to each department of the Government, or shall we distribute the bills to various committees, none of which can know what the others are going to appropriate? I shall oppose the distribution of these bills for the very same reason that I would oppose a proposition to divide the duties of the Committee on Ways and Means and distribute the tariff question to one committee and the internal-revenue question to another. All the sources from which you are to get your revenues ought to be within the knowledge and reach of a single committee which is to consider the raising of the revenue. In like manner, Mr. Speaker, when we come to appropriate, there should be one committee in charge of the matter knowing what is demanded in each department, so that if the revenues are not sufficient to meet all, they will know what should be given to each department and where cutting down can best be effected. We will suppose all the committees of appropriations organized as contemplated by this amendment. What will any one committee know of the line of policy to be pursued or the amount to be appropriated by the others? Then, will not each committee, being onerated with the appropriations for one department only, tend inevitably to magnify that department and to increase expenditures?

I do not question the integrity or intelligence of the committees to which it is proposed to refer these questions. I have very high regard for the men who served on them in the last three Congresses, of which I have been a member. I would trust them fully. And it may be that the very committee to whom you would refer one of these questions could be intrusted with the whole business of appropriations. But I do not think that the splitting up of jurisdiction is going to result in any advantage to the House, but the contrary. I oppose this, not because I favor placing power or position in the hands of any few men of the House, but because I believe to do otherwise will destroy that unity of design which should characterize the appropriations for the various departments.

There has been a clamor for more time for the consideration of general business. To that I wish to address myself for a moment. I sympathize with that demand. No man would go further than I to obtain the expedition of the business of the House and time for the deliberate consideration of public measures. But if it takes time for one committee to report and discuss and pass these bills, by what reasoning, by what arithmetic will you show that eight times that number can do the work any more expeditiously? It can not be done; and I predict that if this report be adopted instead of a saving of time you will see a third more time taken in the consideration of appropriation questions than has ever been taken heretofore. There will be more speaking and more delay.

But enough, as my time is brief, on that branch of the case. I wish next to call the attention of the House to what I think is even more injurious than the distribution of the appropriation bills—I mean the repeal of the third clause of the twenty-first rule, which was adopted when appropriations were at their highest pitch since the war, a clause of the rule which was adopted in the interest of economy, and which when carried out can only result in saving money to the people whom we represent upon this floor.

The following is the section to be stricken out:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Members talk about not wanting to be tied to an appropriation committee. Before you adopt this proposed revision of the rules, before you launch out upon a repeal of the third clause of the twenty-first rule, I wish to call attention to the fact that you will not only bind your committees but you will bind yourselves by the repeal. To-day, under the old rules, if a proposition is made to expend money which you think is not proper, you can offer an amendment on an appropriation bill to prevent it; but should you repeal the third clause of the twenty-first rule and any member of the House offer an amendment changing the law which cuts down a salary or abolishes an office which ought not to exist, you will see the point of order successfully made that it can not be done under the rule on an appropriation bill. The purse is power, and should never be unconditionally surrendered.

Now what spectacle have we presented? Under this revision, if adopted, members will observe by paying particular attention to that portion of the proposed rule which is in italics, and which I have not read, that you may offer amendments which change existing law and increase expenditure, but you can not offer any amendment which changes existing law and retrenches expenditure.

Mr. MORRISON. Where do you find that?

Mr. McMILLIN. I find it in that portion of the rule in italics, which gives to the committees the power to report for "contingencies" of carrying on the several departments of the Government. I believe a "contingent fund" is one not authorized by any particular law. I am glad my friend from Illinois is giving his attention to what I am saying. I know his fine ability and great integrity, and that he joins with all in a desire for the best rules possible. I wish his opinion on it. I believe if that is adopted without discussion now the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, before whom the question comes, would be the sole judge of the "contingencies" or the necessity for appropriations. I do not believe that was the intention of the committee. I wish to know whether it was or not.

Mr. MORRISON. Of course it was not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I understand the gentleman from Illinois that the only object of that amendment is to authorize what is known as contingent expenses in the Departments.

Mr. MORRISON. It is done under the present rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. But it makes a provision for expenditure not authorized by law, and to that extent you might change existing law to increase, but not to diminish, expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to state to the gentleman from Tennessee a fact which he perhaps overlooks, that at the time the rule was adopted, as far back as 1836, it was held by the chairman that an amendment increasing salaries was in order, and an amendment reducing salaries was not in order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I so understood the gentleman from Indiana to state yesterday in the remarks which he then submitted. I am glad to have the construction the gentleman from Illinois places on the pending proposition, that we can not authorize increase of appropriation under this provision. I thought it very important to have a contemporaneous construction of the rule if adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I think the twenty-third rule has done too much for the country to be abandoned now. Star-route plundering, extortionate charges for carrying mails on land-grant railroads, mistakes in arrears-of-pension act, improper use of troops at polls, have all been prevented by it. It would not be difficult to show that one hundred millions of money have been saved by it, and I oppose its repeal.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would have liked a few minutes longer to continue my remarks and add some statistics in support of my statements, but as the time for debate is about up I will not insist.

Mr. STORM. I can not yield longer without violating my promise to the gentleman from New Jersey, to whom I now yield for ten minutes.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would not have the gentleman from Pennsylvania disappoint another.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, it is generally conceded that, owing to the congestive state of affairs so eloquently spoken of by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] yesterday the rules will be modified so as to give relief in calling up bills for the consideration of the House. The only remaining question put to this side of the House is whether we shall have an increase in the expenditures of the Government. During the whole course of this debate the personnel of the Appropriations Committee has not been assailed; there is no charge that the Appropriations Committee has done anything but insist on an economical expenditure of the money of the people.

Now I wish to ask if there is one man in the House who has not, during his whole public career, time and again gone before his people and preached retrenchment. It was not until the year 1874, ten years after the close of the civil war, that the Democratic party got control of this House; and how did it get control? Why, sir, by successfully impeaching the administration of affairs when in the possession of its opponents. Every gentleman on this side of the House, during the time the Democratic party was practically ostracised from the administration of this Government, went before his people and preached to them that only under Democratic administration of this Government was it possible to secure economy of expenditure.

The result of that successful impeachment, sir, of the party then controlling the Government was a tidal wave, and for the first time since the war between the States this House was given by an overwhelming majority to the control of the Democratic party. Shortly after we thus came in control the rules placed in the code established by this House were those which are to-day being assailed; and it was through the successful policy, through the unselfish devotion of this very Appropriations Committee, standing at the doors of the public Treasury, between the Treasury and those making raids upon it, that we have successfully held our own in public affairs.

I want to know, sir, what gentleman here will take upon himself the responsibility of saying by his vote after preaching the doctrine of economy, retrenchment, and reform to the people of the United States, and preaching it successfully to get the control of Federal affairs, that the first action of the successful Democratic party under a Democratic administration shall be to take away their commissions, reduce to the ranks and disgrace the old guard who have protected the Treasury against raids from all sides. The steadfast gentlemen who have staid the march of triumphant extravagance and confederated greed are now to be taken from the watch-towers—gentlemen who, while opposing no legitimate governmental project, have protected the people's money. There was no assailing of "uncrowned kings" when the Czars and Mikados of the opposition were in power.

I was struck yesterday, Mr. Speaker, with a statement which was interjected into the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] then occupying the floor by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG]. The gentleman from Wisconsin confronted him with the expenditures of the Committee on Appropriations on the sundry civil bill for the years from 1880 to 1886, endeavoring to show that under their administration these appropriations had fluctuated; one year they would be increased several millions of dollars as compared with the previous year. Here are the gentleman's figures, and I give them only in round millions, leaving out the odd thousands: For 1880, $17,000,000; for 1881, $22,000,000; for 1882, $22,000,000; for 1883, $25,000,000; for 1884, $23,000,000; for 1885,$22,000,000; and for 1886, $26,000,000.

With all the pressure from every department of this Government, with all the pressure from within and without, that the expenditures of this vast concern called the Federal Government have not increased more than that within that number of years is something extraordinary. It should be printed in letters of gold and put upon the walls of this House as a lasting memorial to the granite integrity and sterling honesty of the gentlemen controlling the Appropriations Committee. I venture the prediction, sir, that, if the affairs of this committee are disseminated, the gentleman from Wisconsin can not in the year 1890 give the figures and show such uniformity in the appropriations of this Government as is exhibited under the control of the Committee on Appropriations as at present authorized by the rules.

And now, sir, the singular spectacle is presented of a combined assault upon the citadel of the Appropriations Committee. The distinguished, determined, and able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] swings the broadax of alleged reform against it. And under the leadership of whom is this House asked to change its rules? This Democratic House is asked, under the leadership of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], to break down the barriers between the public Treasury and those who would take from it dishonestly or imprudently, and we are asked to follow the combined leadership of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Maine in making the assault. It is an unnatural alliance, which we, on this side of the House, can not, in my opinion, safely follow.

I remember well, Mr. Speaker, the old and classical adage, "I fear the Greeks even when they come bringing gifts;" and I am a little apprehensive when I see the gentleman, who in the Forty-seventh Congress remained mute and dumb while these "uncrowned kings," as they have been designated, were dealing with the public Treasury of this country, now foremost in his zeal to break down the Appropriations Committee when the Democratic party is in power in the executive branch of this Government. I am extremely suspicious when I see the king himself of the Appropriations Committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], assail that committee now. When he occupied that position in the House himself there was no voice of warning to the people who were being duped by the Committee on Appropriations; but the moment he finds us in the majority here, when the onerous responsibilities of government are upon us, he wants the Appropriations Committee broken down. And in such a crisis, in such a state of affairs as exists in this Chamber, it is remarkable and most creditable to the patriotism and intelligence and the honesty of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] and my scholarly and statesmanlike colleague from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], who were advocating and upholding the Appropriations Committee—I say it is creditable to their patriotism to find them taking the position they do. It shows, sir, that partisanship does not control honorable gentlemen in this House. It shows that there are men on the other side of this Chamber who believe that we are here to make rules of this House, which affect the whole law of the land and affect the people of this country, not for the benefit of a party but for the benefit of the people. I sincerely hope, not as a partisan or for any partisan advantage, but as one who believes in preserving the public funds, that this rule will not be adopted by the House. For necessary public works every dollar needed; not one cent for robbery and waste.

But in order to excite gentlemen on this side of the floor the river and harbor bill has been brought into the discussion and the singular logic applied to it that those of us who are opposed to large appropriations for rivers and harbors are monopolists. I have never during my short career in the last Congress voted against any bill that curbed the power of railroads, and voted for all that did. I have on the other hand uniformly voted against river and harbor bills. Why? Was it, Mr. Speaker, because I was opposed to making a canal at the Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River to improve navigation and lessen the cost of transportation? No, sir! Was it because I am opposed to legitimate improvements that are necessary and give employment to honest labor? No, sir! But because I was opposed to attaching to these natural and legitimate projects, such as improving great rivers and harbors, hundreds of little pirate craft with leave to float into the Treasury of the Government at the public expense. If my time permitted there are one or two other considerations I would like very much to present.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCADOO. I understand my time has almost expired.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to ask the gentleman whether I understood him correctly as saying that the gross amount of appropriations for the support of the Government were only $22,000,000.

Mr. MCADOO. I was speaking of the appropriations in the sundry civil bill.

The SPEAKER. The time allotted to the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I do not claim that our present system of House rules is perfect or even satisfactory, though it is only five years since they were revised by a very competent and experienced committee. They can and ought to be improved. But the most important changes recommended by the present Committee on Rules are not, in my opinion, the changes the people of this country desire.

Much has been said in this discussion about one-man power, and the undue influence of the Committee on Appropriations, and the embarrassment we labor under by being trammeled by our present rules.

These members want legislation "made easy" and their access to the public Treasury free from every impediment. I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the people demand no such thing of us. The personal importance, ambition, or convenience of members is not what the people are clamoring for. It is not the quantity but the quality of legislation that they are concerned about. They want every safeguard thrown around the public Treasury that wisdom and prudence can suggest. This House is about entering upon an experiment fraught with great danger to the public interests and to the political party on this side of the Chamber.

Has the past history of this committee been such as to warrant its pratical obliteration from the list of committees of the House? Has it not been for the last ten years the great protector of the public Treasury? Has it not compelled the practice of economy where it was not practiced before? Has it not within that period saved to the tax-payers more than $100,000,000, and turned out of power one of the great political parties of the country and put its opponents in power?

The abandonment of this agency that has proved to be a safe and reliable one for one which, to say the best, is of doubtful expediency, is not the part of wisdom.

That the country which is least governed is the best governed is a maxim in strict accord with the idea of true civil liberty. That the world is too much governed is equally true, and is especially true of us under our dual system of State and National Government. The Constitution of the United States has given to Congress a very few general powers of legislation. The great mass of legislative subjects has been reserved to the States themselves. Under our modern idea that this is a paternal Government, and that it is the duty of the Government to do something for everybody, a great deal of legislation is attempted that ought to find no place in our system.

Nine-tenths of the bills introduced into this House have no business here. The members who offer them know it. They are offered without the least expectation that they will become a law. The great mass of claims are mostly stale or fraudulent, and are kept alive here by claim agents and lobbyists without the knowledge or consent of the claimants in many cases. Pension bills by the thousand are introduced, after they have been carefully and patiently examined by the Bureau of Pensions—a bureau established for the very purpose of determining the merits of this class of claims. And general bills—those relating to general legislation—are often reported fifty times in one Congress. So when it is claimed that not 6 per cent. of the bills introduced are acted on, I think I may safely say that 6 per cent. is all that ought to be acted on.

Rules of parliamentary procedure are framed not only to facilitate legislation, but to protect the minority and the public Treasury. They ought to be framed before Congress enters upon the business of general legislation. They should be framed when the legislative mind is free from prejudice, feeling, or bias. It is too late when the ambition, greed, or prejudice of members is once excited. Great stress is laid on the assertion that we are "hampered" by our "iron-clad" rules; they have been styled in this debate as a "dead hand." Yet the chief value of these rules consists in the fact that they "hamper" just at the time when a hamper is necessary.

In this discussion it has been repeated again and again that the majority ought to do just what it pleases and when it pleases. That is the underlying thought running through the report of the majority of the committee. As an abstract proposition it may be true, but as applied to parliamentary law I deny it. And there are members of this House favoring this change who will call on the gods to save them from the consequences of the change before this Congress shall expire. It is not true as applied to the most sacred rights of the people.

Under the Constitution of the United States one-fifth of the members of this House can compel the other four-fifths to go on the record on any vote. A majority can not expel a member, however clear the guilt which disqualifies him to sit with honorable men. It takes two-thirds to overcome the effects of a Presidential veto. And no amendment can be made to that instrument unless two-thirds of Congress or two-thirds of the several States propose it; then it can not become a part of the Constitution until ratified by three-fourths of the Legislatures or conventions of the several States, so that nine of the smallest States in the Union can make any change of that instrument impossible at present.

Here is "hampering" for you. For nearly a century we have been subject to "tyranny" of our patriotic ancestors. No one now would have the hardihood to deny that these propositions are among the most important in our admirable Constitution, and illustrate the profound wisdom and sagacity of its framers. They foresaw the time when passion would dethrone the reason, when prejudice would usurp the judgment, and provided for the emergency. Let us imitate their wisdom.

Ulysses, warned of the danger he would encounter in sailing by the isle of the sirens, filled the ears of his companions with wax, that they might not hear the sorcerous song of the sirens; he commanded that he should be bound by thongs to the mast of his ship, that he might not yield to the same enchanting spell. Let us do likewise; there are dangers ahead—the sorcerous isles of rivers and harbors, of service pensions, of public buildings, and wild schemes for depleting the public Treasury; and may we by the strong cords of parliamentary law be restrained from yielding. "Lead us not into temptation" should be our daily prayer. You have seen the storm of angry passion sweep this Hall; you have seen it wrought into such a pitch of excitement that it refused to hear read a respectful message from the President of the United States.

Both political parties in this House for many years have respected the rights of the minority by a provision that not less than two-thirds of its members should suspend the rules. Yet I have seen the time when each of the great political parties, when in the majority, has felt "hampered" by the rule which thus protected the minority.

I appeal to my political associates, upon whom new duties and responsibilities have been recently imposed. As a party we have entered upon a new era, which is to determine our future destiny. The people have trusted us because they mistrusted our opponents. The latter refused to reduce superfluous taxation. Instead of leaving the surplus of revenues in the pockets of the people, they allowed them to remain in the Treasury, a tempting source of danger and extravagance. As a party we have in the most solemn manner pledged ourselves to lift this unnecessary burden from the shoulders of the tax-payers.

Our President has honestly fulfilled his part of this pledge in his annual message. And are we, the direct representatives of the people, going to redeem our pledge? Adopt the proposed change of rules, and in my judgment you can not redeem your pledge and keep faith with the people, however sincerely you may desire. Our opponents at least handed over to us an overflowing treasury; and shall we, without reducing taxation one cent, find ourselves at the end of this Congress with a deficiency? A surplus of revenues is bad; a deficiency is worse.

The question of the distribution of the appropriations is not new. It was thoroughly discussed in 1880, on a report made by a very able committee. After a full discussion, this House preferred to stand by the old landmarks. Later, the same question was discussed in the Senate, with the like result. They declared that the unity of this important fiscal agency was essential to a wise economy in the appropriation of the public revenues. That the division of its duties among seven or eight committees, charged as most of them are with important general legislation, will not remedy, but enhance, the evils complained of.

When you divide responsibility you diminish the sense of it. One hundred men will do what fifty will not, fifty will do what ten will not, and ten will do what one will not.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the "undue influence" of certain members of the Appropriations Committee of this House. Every member of this House acquires his influence here by virtue of his natural endowment, improved by study, by experience, and by his position on some committee of the House. The first two sources of influence are inalienable. This body can not deprive their possessor of them. The influence and prominence due to his committee position can be taken away by the Speaker of this House. If the old committee has improperly used the powers which must necessarily belong to it, it is no reason for abolishing the committee, but for the removal of its members. The evil, instead of being remedied, is only intensified. For one "boss" committee we are to have seven or eight little "boss" committees. Mr. Speaker, I do not like bosses, but if we must have them, give us a competent, honest, and intelligent one. Napoleon said he would prefer one poor general to a half-dozen good ones. I prefer one good leader to a half-dozen, good or bad.

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes remain of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM].

Mr. STORM. I yield the balance of my time to my colleague [Mr. KELLEY]. I had promised him fifteen minutes, but, as I have not that time left now to yield him, I hope there will be no objection to his proceeding for the full fifteen minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the House will give me back the five minutes which my colleague gave me in its presence and which he has taken back again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to ten minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. If I know myself I shall, so far as the limited time allowed me to discuss the questions before me will permit, discuss them without personal or partisan feeling. I am, I believe, a conservative man, and my habit is to bear the ills I meet rather than to fly to those I know not of. But patience and long suffering have made me feel that no rules which the majority of this House will adopt can be more oppressive than those it is now proposed to amend.

The legislation of a democratic republic of fifty millions of people of at least ordinary intelligence ought to be the result of deliberation. Our legislation is not deliberate. It is never preceded by deliberation. It is done by a few selected members. The mass of the members of this House can learn what has been done and why it was done only after it has been done. I think, sir, the ills existing rules inflict have been borne until they have become unendurable, and the House in duty to the country should emancipate itself.

Sir, it may be that the wisdom and honesty of the House are concentrated in a single committee thereof, but I do not believe it. I find myself one of three hundred and twenty-five chosen Representatives, who, I believe, present a fair average of the prosperous and intelligent men of their respective districts. If it is true that we need but fifteen men to determine what appropriations ought to be made, what existing offices ought to be abolished or reduced in consideration under the plea of economy, and what laws ought to be repealed or enacted, why not change our laws and save the pay of the other three hundred and ten members? If, sir, you have a better guarantee of integrity and intelligence in the case of a committee of fifteen, operating, so far as the public is concerned, in the dark, with a guardian at the door of the committee-room to prevent intruders from spying into the procedure, than you have with three hundred and twenty-five men, each directly responsible to an intelligent constituency, operating in the broadest electric light, with the representatives of the press eying them with the microscope and the telescope in order that every constituent may judge of the wisdom and integrity of their acts—if the secret committee offers the better guarantee I have miscalculated probabilities.

I believe there would be a larger sense of responsibility and more careful legislation in the broad gaze of the country by three hundred and twenty-five members, each feeling his direct responsibility, than is now done by the Committee on Appropriations, and I repeat that I am not saying anything personal or partisan. I am treating an old sore which I have probed time and again.

In the Forty-second Congress the Committee on Appropriations was a Republican committee. The last day of the session was the 10th of the month of July, and 12 o'clock had been fixed as the hour for adjournment. Suffering from hemorrhages, and prostrate almost to the last degree, I spent the evening before going from hotel to hotel and from lodging-house to lodging-house to awaken the consciences of the Republican members of the House, and in pursuance of this labor when the House came together I moved to recommit to the committee of conference an appropriation bill upon which a force bill had been placed as a rider under circumstances that justified me in saying that in view of the circumstances under which that rider had been put there, in view of the promises made to the minority, that if they would yield the position by which they could filibuster the session to its close the conference committee would abandon the force bill which had been put on in the Senate; that in view of these circumstances I felt justified in saying that in my judicial career I had sentenced to hard labor men who did not better fulfill the provisions of the statute of Pennsylvania for the punishment of false pretenses than the majority of that committee of conference had done in keeping that force bill there.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania have expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I have asked the House to give me the five minutes given me by my colleague in its presence and which were taken from me in its presence also.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. That is right; but I hope it will be five minutes after four when the general debate is closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] objects, unless there be an understanding that the debate shall not close till five minutes past four. Is that the understanding?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I shall not detain the House by quoting my language on that occasion, but if gentlemen are curious enough they will find it in volume 91 of the Congressional Globe, which contains the proceedings of the second session of the Forty-second Congress. It is under the date of the 8th, but the incidents of which I speak occurred on the 10th, for we had been in session on Saturday and Sunday, and instead of adjourning at 12 o'clock that day we adjourned at 8 o'clock that night, having freed ourselves and the majority from the reproach of having by false pretenses and deliberately false statements put a most objectionable rider upon an appropriation bill.

I denounce the habit of admitting riders as a most fruitful source of legislative meannesses and frauds. Sir, it was in 1871, after this House had defeated in half a dozen forms a proposition to increase the pay of members and give them back pay, that so many of the members of both Houses who, upon general reputation, were regarded as purists, came to feel themselves tainted and some of them to be so adjudged by their constituents. In the Senate, nobody knows how, a rider was put on an appropriation bill providing, among other things, for a slight increase of pensions; the amended bill came back to the House, and, under the plea that if we did not adopt it as amended we could not give $4 per month additional to each pensioner, we concurred in the amendment. Rather than deprive the pensioners of $4 each per month we agreed to take a few thousand dollars ourselves and to raise our pay from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum. [Laughter.]

There were those who let the money stand to their credit with the Sergeant-at-Arms until the gentlemen up there [pointing to the reporters' gallery] with their microscopes and telescopes had shown the country what had been going on; and then these conscientious gentlemen tried to return the money to the Treasury. But the Sergeant-at-Arms would not take it, as it had passed to their credit. Some of them concluded they would send it to religious, municipal, or benevolent bodies; one at least of the religious bodies asked: "Why do you give this money away?" "Well, we do not think we have a perfect title to it." Then the reply in at least the instance referred to was, "We do not want to receive that to which you doubt your own title;" and so the conscientious gentleman was compelled to keep the money. [Laughter.] But for that rider some gentlemen who went to their graves feeling disgraced and others who could not bear to speak of the matter or to hear it spoken of would have gone through the remainder of their lives proudly as they had walked before that bill was passed. Let us prohibit the possibility of such pernicious legislation.

To avert inquiry or doubt, I beg leave to say that I took that money and kept it; and the only threat I ever heard made against me in connection therewith was from a constituent, who said that if I had not been man enough to vote myself just pay, or, having taken it, had attempted to convert it into a matter of piety or philanthropy, he never would have voted for me again. [Laughter and applause.] I believed that I had earned the money; my constituents knew and said that I had; and with apparent unanimity they approved the act.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I was promised by the gentleman who is, I believe, to succeed me a brief portion of his time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we ought to have the rest of this statement by unanimous consent.

Mr. LORE. Will five minutes be enough for the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLEY. You promised me ten.

Mr. LORE. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed for ten minutes in the time of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

Mr. KELLEY. On the 17th of April, 1879, in a controversy which will be found reported in volume 37 of the RECORD, again I defended the rights of the minority against the majority, when the Republican chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and leader of the House insisted that for the minority to filibuster in order to prevent the putting of an obnoxious rider on an appropriation bill was to invoke revolution. I have indicated to gentlemen where they can find this debate if they wish to consider it; I shall therefore not detain the House by reading it.

And now, when we are considering the revision of the rules, I ask that that may be done which, in the face of such influences, I have pleaded for fifteen years to have done by my own party—to give dignity to our legislation and to enable the people's representatives to know what they are doing when enacting laws. They can not do this while the rules permit riders to be put upon appropriation bills; and while under these rules no legislation can be effectively originated outside of the Committee on Appropriations, unless it be a bill which will command unanimous consent or a stray bill that may get a two-thirds vote or a pension bill. I include pension bills, because we have for several years by special order remitted the whole subject of pensions to a committee who bring up their bills at sessions held one night in each week, when ten or fifteen gentlemen decide what soldiers may have pensions and what soldiers may not.

I remember that not a great while ago, when the chairman of the Pension Committee was from Pennsylvania, and the House had confided the business to that committee and the few interested gentlemen who might meet it once a week, a story got abroad that no soldier who did not hail from Pennsylvania was getting a pension, or if one did it was by a system of log-rolling, when some member coming in at a night session and wanting a particular pension bill passed would object to other bills and demand a quorum until his point was yielded. So we find that there is no deliberation even on pension bills.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] expressed earnestly the hope that we would not interfere with the blessed privilege on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to apply riders proposing to reduce expenditures.

Sir, I have a notion that the body of this House can tell whether a bill will reduce expenditures as well as the chairman of the Committee of the Whole or the Speaker can on having a rider suddenly brought to his attention. In some cases plausible phraseology is adopted which gives a measure the semblance of reducing expenditures, while in fact it is punishing somebody or some class of employés who have incurred the displeasure of the gentleman who presents the proposition and says it will effect a reduction of expenditures. Thus by this provision the House executes private malice. There have, I firmly believe, been such cases. I do not charge any member of the committee or of the House with having done anything of that kind deliberately. But plausible cases have been presented and acted on, and we should prevent their recurrence by repealing the provision under which they may occur. Let rules permit the House to legislate deliberately, and members to understand what they are doing when acting upon appropriation bills.

Gentlemen say if you send appropriations to committees having business in charge they will wait until the last days of the session, as the Appropriations Committee has done. Oh, no. If the Naval Committee presents a bill for building ships it will want its bill to get through, and you will have the work proposed by its bill and the scheme of appropriation, so much for this year and so much for each year until the work shall have been completed.

The report of the committee proposes to systematize appropriations, to adapt them to the work in hand. How is it now, sir? Appropriations are made of little more than enough in one year to repair the waste of the past winter. The committee in charge of the work could tell how much would be required. The Committee on Appropriations makes up its mind it will make a good campaign document if it does not appropriate this year as much as it did last year, and so it cuts down a little here and a little there, and more here and more there. In the matter of annual appropriations for public buildings and grounds they are often wasted in repairing the work left unfinished and exposed to the weather during the interval. I believe, sir, wisdom and a just sense of economy, and above all the preservation of purity and honor in the story of our legislation, invite the adoption of the change of rules proposed by the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE] has fifty-three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, the very best test of any system of rules or laws is the application of them and the experience we have had under them. I came here a new member in the Forty-eighth Congress, and I may say, sir, the system of rules which we are now seeking to amend was then in operation, and the effect of that system, so far as I could learn, was legislative paralysis. It may be a strong term, but I will submit a very few facts and ask whether I speak correctly or not.

We will all agree that rules, whether they be of a general parliamentary character or have been specially passed to meet exigencies of the body for which they are adapted, have for their single end the passage of just legislation. Now, sir, did our rules promote that just legislation? After the Forty-eighth Congress met the committees were formed; they met in their respective committee-rooms day after day, week after week, working up the business which was committed to them by this House, and they reported to this House 8,290 bills. They came from the respective committees, and they were consigned to the Calendars of this House, which became for them the tomb of the Capulets; most of them were not heard of afterward. From the Senate there were 2,700 bills. I will not speak of them. So far as the House is concerned, we did not act upon a tithe of the bills presented. There were less than 800 of the 8,290 which came under the supervision of this House that were finally acted upon. Then, sir, nine-tenths of the time of the committees of the Forty-eighth Congress was wasted. We met week after week, month after month, and labored over the cases prepared, and reported bills to the House. They were put upon the Calendars and were there buried, to be brought in again and again in succeeding Congresses.

That was the operation of the rules which we now seek to amend. There was very little general legislation passed by the Forty-eighth Congress that affected our people to any marked extent that was not in the shape of riders on appropriation bills. I think I will not be contradicted in this statement. Then this legislative paralysis operated not only by impeding the passage of the bills reported to this House, but absolutely deprived this House of its legislative functions to say in general legislative bills what should be the policy of the country and what laws should or should not be adopted.

Such general legislation came in the shape of riders upon appropriation bills; and how were they passed? I will ask gentlemen who were with me in the Forty-eighth Congress how these measures were passed. Why, sir, in a number of cases under a suspension of the rules; forced through the House with no opportunity for fair and full consideration at the hands of the House in any respect. Some of these appropriation bills upon which the riders were fastened came in here in the closing hours of the session, and then, under a suspension of the rules, were forced through the House. Why, I saw the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in the very closing hours of the Forty-eighth Congress standing there in front of the Speaker's desk with all his masterful power beseeching the House of Representatives to pass the sundry civil bill in order to obviate the necessity of an extra session of Congress. Am I not justified in saying there was absolutely a legislative paralysis prevailing in the Forty-eighth Congress?

Am I speaking too strongly? Am I not fully warranted in the assertion by the facts? Why was it? It was not because the people did not want legislation. From one end of this land to the other there was a demand for legislation. The great commercial interests of the country demanded a regulation of transportation on our great commercial highways; the country demanded action on the Presidential succession, the building up of a navy, the fortification of our coasts, and I might enumerate measures that were demanded by public interests until they were piled up here to an appalling height. All of these came from the people, and they asked us for legislation. It was not, then, the fault of the people.

I will ask whose was the fault? Was it the fault of the members of this House? I have seen them thronging that area in front of the Speaker's desk asking to be recognized for the consideration of important measures, but they were not recognized because under the rules one man could say "I object," and unless by unanimous consent, or by a suspension of the rules of this House, there would be no opportunity to get a bill before the House for its consideration. I have seen three hundred and ten members of the House asking recognition, asking that they might be heard in support of their measures and that a majority of their confreres might pass upon these measures of public policy, but they were not even permitted to be heard.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, was it the fault of the man who presided over the deliberations of this body in the Forty-eighth Congress. Whenever a parliamentary question was raised it was decided with a promptness and impartiality that challenged alike the favorable comment of opponents as well as political friends. Then again I say, why this legislative paralysis? Why could nothing be done that the people demanded?

If the members of this House desired legislation, and if there was no fault in the promptness or the efficiency of the Speaker, why did we not secure needed legislation? I will submit to the members who were here in that Congress that the fault is chargeable to the system of rules which we are now asking the House to amend.

Sir, if I were to select from mythology a fit type for the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress under that system of rules which paralyzed the power of the House, prevented the transaction of business, and centralized power in the hands of the Appropriations Committee, I should take the classic figure of Laocoon and his two sons struggling and writhing in the folds of the serpents and hold it up a true symbol. The rules operated in this way: Your bills were placed upon these Calendars, and then, unless by unanimous consent, you could never reach them. There was always some one in the House ready to object unless the measure was one of the utmost insignificance or lack of interest, a measure which nobody knew anything about and about which nobody cared anything; but whenever a matter of grave public interest came up, a matter which affected the interests of the people, there was always some man who raised his voice against it, and most potently, by the simple words, "I object," and that was an end of the effort on the part of the House.

There were certain days, it is true, in which we might come in under a suspension of the rules and reach matters of public concern, but so infrequent as to avail little. The Committee on Rules now ask us to amend the old rules in such way as will relieve us of the incubus that sat upon us. The amendments, as I understand them, work such changes as will relieve the last-named difficulty. It gives us one hour to call the committees for the purpose of considering such measures as they may deem of public importance, or by which the public will be benefited. It lets the House have the opportunity to pass upon just and proper legislation. Another and a very important one is that when we are in Committee of the Whole House we can pass over a bill and take up the next one without the formality of rising and going back into the House, disposing of the question there, and then back into the Committee of the Whole again. This manifestly will greatly facilitate the transaction of business.

Another amendment proposed by the committee strikes at the powers of the Committee on Appropriations, and has justly provoked criticism in the House. I allude to the amendment distributing the appropriation bills. Permit me to say, sir, that I am heartily in favor of that distribution. I do not yield to any man in this House in my regard and respect for members of the last Appropriations Committee or such a committee as you may see fit to create under your power in the present House, which I know will be wisely exercised. But I believe the distribution of these bills will effect a needed change in the policy and in the mode of administering the affairs of the House. And let me suggest some of the methods. In the first place, what is the proposition? To distribute the appropriations bills among the committees of the House. Why, the Committee on Appropriations have heretofore adopted this very plan. It consisted of fifteen members. That committee of fifteen is subdivided into five subcommittees of three, to whom, and to whom alone, is given the entire consideration of the subject-matter of the various bills which are reported to the House by this committee.

Now we propose, instead of letting the Committee on Appropriations divide up these bills among their members, that this House shall divide the bills up among committees consisting of fifteen members each. Is it not better, considering the policy of our Government, that we should have fifteen members—wise, active, intelligent, zealous, particularly qualified for the special work—who may examine carefully and thoroughly in their committee-room every bill that is presented to them? Are not fifteen men thus selected from this House better than three of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations to digest the naval appropriation bill or the Army bill? You have the benefit of the experience of fifteen men. You diffuse the knowledge of the subject among those fifteen men.

Let me ask you again, is it not in the very nature of things reasonable and just that fifteen men who have had the matter of the building up of the Navy as the one theme for their investigation during the entire session of Congress, who understand the needs of that branch of the Government, who know equally well what methods to adopt in order to economize in one place or to enlarge in another—is it not reasonable that in their hands the naval appropriation bill would receive the most intelligent consideration? It is only the men who understand the necessity that is laid upon the people for the enlargement of any particular branch of our Government that can intelligently lop off in one place or enlarge in another.

In giving the bill to fifteen men of equal intelligence instead of the subcommittee of three we are carrying out the identical policy inaugurated by the Committee on Appropriations; but we do it through the Speaker of this House and the members of this House instead of through the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whoever he may be. I submit that upon that point we shall gain not only in numbers but in that careful and thorough analysis and investigation of the subject that will enable these committees intelligently to frame laws to meet the necessities of the Departments in the subject-matters intrusted to their care.

But there is another point, and it is one which has been mooted and considered in this House. Distribute these appropriation bills and take away the power of putting riders on them, and at once the appropriations cease to be a matter of much controversy either one way or another. They are simply the aggregation of the expenses needed for any Department. There will be no contest about them; they will be introduced one day and probably in two or three days will pass without opposition. The very subject of contention, the general legislation, the riders you have attached to the respective bills, will be removed from them, and they will be passed without much difficulty.

Another advantage will be gained. The very rivalry existing between these committees will promote legislation in this respect. It will secure earlier reports by the respective committees to this House. Having nothing to do with general legislation, having simply to receive the estimates from the respective Departments, which they formulate into shape and present, there will be no need of holding the bills off till the last hours of the session of Congress and then pressing them for passage under a suspension of the rules; but they will be introduced in due season, and there will be an opportunity for members of this House fairly and fully to consider and discuss every provision of them.

I am not afraid of the clashing that is so much apprehended by the gentlemen on this floor between these rival committees struggling to get precedence on this floor, and for this reason: Stripped of their riders, as these bills will be, there will be no necessity for struggling. They will come in in the ordinary methodical course of business. They will be passed as any other financial bill is passed, without much comment, unless they embrace some novel experiment, some new feature, or some topic like the creation of a navy or the coast fortifications, which in themselves become a matter of needed consideration. But they will be here early, the rivalry will not take place, and this House will be able to exercise one of its prerogatives which in the Forty-eighth Congress we had no power to exercise—it will have the opportunity of considering the measures carefully and with ample time at their disposal.

I submit on these grounds that the distribution of the appropriations among the several committees having the particular subject-matters in charge is a wise and judicious thing. I see no other mode of getting out of this legislative labyrinth than by the thread of common sense and amendment which has been thrown into it by the Committee on Rules. By means of this we may get out of it. We want no shirt of Nessus investing this House. We mean to be free. This nation has grown too large and this House too wise for that expedient.

Nor am I afraid of the phantom that our friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has with great and masterly, I may say with consummate, skill held up before other Congresses and this Congress. Like the terrific ghost of Banquo, it will not down, but is ever by his side. Increase of the expenditures has been the argument that has been used again and again. It is the one argument upon which opposition to the amendment of the rules rests. I will ask is there a basis for this apprehension? I am not afraid of a reasonable expenditure. I am sometimes afraid that in the intense zeal of the gentleman who sits at the door of the Treasury in this House he forgets there is another word in the English language, and that parsimony sometimes passes for economy.

Economy is wise; but it means the best use of the money to accomplish an end. It is not economy to take an estimate of $20,000,000, sent in by one of the Departments, and pare it down $5,000,000, without any regard to the necessities of our Government. That is not the true method of reaching a just conclusion. I agree fully with the member from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], that the test and the only reasonable test by which we are to measure our appropriations is the necessary wants of the Government in the respective Departments upon a strictly economical basis; and the American people will not be deluded by cries of "economy." Whenever justly you ask them for the sum needed for any arm of the service they will respond with ready zeal and will not cavil over a small amount.

I agree fully with the gentleman from Texas that the amount demanded should be commensurate with the absolute needs of the respective Departments. Why, sir, the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations receives the estimates from the Departments. Under the change proposed your committee of fifteen charged with the jurisdiction of the particular subject will receive the estimates from precisely the same quarter. They will bring to the adjustment of the question the intelligence resulting from the inquiry of fifteen men during, perhaps, the entire session. Instead of the paring process of cutting down $20,000,000 to $15,000,000, or, vice versa, the enlargement of $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, the appropriations will be measured by the just wants of each respective Department.

I am not sure but that in the effort of some gentlemen on this floor to magnify the fiscal concerns of this nation we have forgotten that we have other and more important functions. While I would not in any way depreciate the necessity of watching carefully and thoroughly the finances of our country, yet I submit the questions how we shall get money and how we shall spend money are not all that three hundred and twenty-five men are sent here for. There are other needs.

This country of ours is broad; and I sometimes fear that the dwarfing of our legislation into the mere financial circle may have resulted in producing just the two classes of statesmen who in the past have grown as fungi on our body-politic: First, the class of men who imagine that a dollar when it is about to be taken from the public Treasury, unless for their own districts, is about as large as the moon; and another class of men, whoever they may be, who would open up all the avenues to the Treasury and cause streams of gold and silver to flow out into the pockets of the people everywhere. But the happy and the true medium is between these two classes of exaggerated statesmen. There are other matters in which we have an abiding interest besides simply the finances of the country.

The suggestion has been made, "Divide up these committees, and immediately you will have a system of log-rolling." But if you take away the right to place riders on appropriations bills, that system of log-rolling will be, to some extent, broken up. The committees having charge of appropriations will have no need of log-rolling, because they will measure their appropriations by the exact demands of the Government, and when they ask only that which the Government needs the American people will give readily.

But, sir, that objection has as its substratum an idea which I apprehend no man is willing to place himself upon in this House; that is, either the mental imbecility or the moral untrustworthiness of the other members of this House. Accredit the remaining three hundred and ten members of the House with intelligence, with moral probity, and you may safely trust these measures in their hands. Log-rolling need no more prevail then than under any other possible system. And, as a member on my right suggests, the very rules you are asked now to amend originated this practice of log-rolling. It is a fungus that grew upon legislative proceedings under them—an outgrowth of the system that is now hampering this House.

I find that my time is rapidly passing, and, as there is another gentleman to speak in the hour, I will therefore say but a word in conclusion. These amendments of the Committee on Rules commend themselves to me because they will open a door by which the younger members on this floor may have some opportunity to get before the House measures which their constituents are anxious to have considered. Again, bear in mind that these amendments are recommended to the House by a committee embracing five old and experienced members—the Speaker and the distinguished gentlemen from Pennsylvania, from Illinois, from Maine, and from New York—five able and experienced men, who certainly ought to know something about legislation. They recommend four to one the change in these rules. Who are the wiser? If you test the question by experience and by numbers, apart from the argument, this committee stands four to one, and the members joining in the majority report are gentlemen of large experience, of incorruptible integrity, and men possibly who know and are willing to take the consequences.

But suppose it did lead to a little enlargement of legislation and expenditure, would my friend from Indiana come here and wear his boy's roundabout which he has outgrown and when he has come to man's stature? Would he take his old coat split up the back like a locust? No; but he would go to a tailor and have made and put on a new coat meeting his present necessities and growth. In 1789 $3,000,000 met all our national expenses; in 1884 it had grown to $300,000,000. If we grow our appropriations will grow; if we expand we will throw away our old clothes, and we will not let our progress in the future be blocked by moss-grown and unsuitable rules and regulations. I am in favor of adopting the course which wisdom suggests, and therefore shall support the proposed revision of the rules.

I will yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] is entitled to twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the entire discussion on the report of the Committee on Rules, and especially that portion of the debate sustaining the views of the minority. I have heard an immense number of predictions, a great deal of prophesying, to sustain the views of the minority, but I have yet to hear one single legislative fact stated in their support. There has been a great deal of talk about what will or may happen to the country and this House.

For the past few years we have had the opportunity to test the proposition presented by the Committee on Rules, and I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] or any other gentleman sustaining that minority report to present one single fact or number of facts to sustain him in the general assertion he makes in his report that the distribution of appropriation bills to committees having jurisdiction of the subject-matters of those bills have resulted either in extravagance or increased appropriations, except increased as the bills reported to the House from the Committee on Appropriations have been increased on account of the growth and prosperity of the country.

I shall occupy the few minutes of the time of the House allotted to me in presenting some dry statistics to be found on record. In the Forty-sixth Congress the Committee on Agriculture was charged for the first time with reporting the agricultural appropriation bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], in his remarks day before yesterday in sustaining his minority report before this House, said nothing about the history of the five appropriation bills which that Committee on Agriculture had reported and which have become laws by the action of the House and Senate.

What are the facts? When the Committee on Agriculture in the Forty-sixth Congress was first given jurisdiction over the agricultural appropriation bill they found that under the fostering care, under the rules and principles of economy which had governed the Committee on Appropriations, there had been allowed to be built up by annual appropriations three or four separate and distinct peripatetic commissions, which were charged to the Agricultural Department first in one form and then in another. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will remember the grasshopper commission and the sugar-experiment commission.

Mr. RANDALL. Not by me.

Mr. HATCH. You were on the committee and you kept them alive. You need not shake your head at it; you are responsible for it as much as any member of the committee, whether you voted for it in committee or not. You remember another commission located in the Treasury Department to keep up quarantine stations on the seacoast for animals imported into this country—all these gentlemen drawing magnificent salaries, with quarters in Washington, surrounded by a retinue of clerks, and nothing on the face of God's earth to do except make a written report once in twelve months. The first thing the Agricultural Committee did was to strike them down and "wipe them out" and concentrate the agricultural business of the country in the Department of Agriculture.

That committee in the five years it has had charge of this bill has done more for the interest of agriculture than the Committee on Appropriations has done for the last fifty years. The last bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations for the support of the agricultural interests of this country was in 1879, and amounted to $215,900. About sixty-five or seventy thousand dollars were appropriated outside of that to these extra commissions. The first bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture of this House was in 1880, for $212,000; in 1881, $264,300, and in 1882 there were placed on that bill separate and special appropriations amounting to $40,000, which made the bill for that year $371,500.

In 1883 we had $50,000 of special appropriations under the special recommendation of the Commissioner and the President, and also $80,000 for collecting agricultural statistics, which made the bill $487,080. In 1884 the bill amounted to $428,140, including $80,000 again for the statistical division; in 1885, $677,690, including the amount of $150,000, which passed this House as an appropriation in the animal-industry bill, and which ought not to be chargeable to the annual agricultural appropriation bill, and also $100,000 for the statistical division, which was strongly and earnestly urged by the Commissioner and approved by Congress. The bill creating a Bureau of Animal Industry was a separate and distinct measure. It was brought before this House and after a consideration which extended over nearly thirty days was passed by the House. Afterward it passed the Senate and became a law. In the bill making appropriations for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1886, we reduced the aggregrate amounts to $598,438, including an appropriation to the Bureau of Animal Industry of $100,000 and reducing the appropriation for the statistical division to $75,000.

The tabular statement which I hold in my hand, and which I ask leave to print without reading it entire, shows all the appropriations to this Department proper from the year 1877 to 1886, inclusive.

So that the annual increase in the agricultural appropriation bill during these five years has been less than that of other general appropriation bills for any Department of the Government that has been reported to this House. Why, my friends, what do you think of the gentleman's attack in this report upon this great industry of agriculture, that never had outside of these special appropriations over about $400,000 per annum, when in a bill reported by him at the last session of Congress, and which he asked the House to pass under a suspension of the rules, there are two items, one for the World's Industrial Exposition at New Orleans, La., $300,000, and the expositions at Cincinnati and Louisville, $20,000, or a total of $320,000 in two single items? And appropriated to what? Simply to a private enterprise, to a local enterprise; appropriations that ought never to have passed this House, in my judgment, and which I steadily voted against for six years.

What is this Department of Agriculture and what does it represent, this great industry that costs between $450,000 to $500,000 per annum? What is it? Let me call the attention of the House to a few figures:

Our largest total exports in a single year were during the twelve months ended June 30, 1881, when they were, excluding specie, valued at $883,925,947. For the last five years an average of 78.42 per cent. of these exports has consisted of agricultural products. The value of wheat exports for the last twenty-four years was $1,600,000,000, and of flour $700,000,000. Since the war closed 55,000,000 bales of cotton, valued at over $3,400,000,000, have been exported.

For the last twenty-five years one-fourth of our products of agriculture, an industry in which half our people are engaged, have been sent abroad. The carrying of these exports to seaboard by rail and water gave 80,000,000 tons of freight to our carrying companies in ten years, representing to them a business of $800,000,000. These exports for the last ten years amounted to $7,000,000,000, Great Britain taking about four-sevenths of the whole, or $3,933,000,000.

For the ten years ended June 30, 1884, Great Britain took about 565,000,000 bushels of wheat out of an export of 920,000,000 bushels; 31,000,000 of 59,000,000 barrels of wheat flour; 445,000,000 of 640,000,000 bushels of Indian corn, and $1,200,000,000 worth out of $2,000,000,000 worth of cotton. Three-fourths of our exports are agricultural products, and of these England takes about two-thirds, or about one-half of the whole.

This is the great industry of the country, and this is the number of our population engaged in and interested in it which gets from the Government in these annual bills the beggarly sum of about $500,000, and that has been increased to that amount by these special acts creating the Bureau of Animal Industry for the protection of the live-stock of the country, and the $100,000 which we reduced in the last appropriation bill to $75,000 for the Statistical Bureau.

Now, I desire to call attention of the House to this record of facts. The first bill presented to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Committee on Agriculture, of which I had the honor to be chairman, passed the House, having been reported previously, on the 4th day of April, 1884. That bill consumed in this House about thirty-five or forty minutes in its consideration, but one single amendment having been offered to the bill as it came from the committee, and that by Mr. Vance, of North Carolina, who moved to increase the seed appropriation from $75,000 to $100,000 on account of the increased membership of the House. When that bill was placed before the House on its final passage there were ayes 211, noes none.

Not a single vote in the House of Representatives was recorded against it, while we find recorded for it, "ay," in the affirmative, the names of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. They had no objection to that bill. They did not object to an item in it; if they did, they ought never to have voted for it. It passed the Senate almost unchallenged, and came back here with but two or three Senate amendments. The conference between the two Houses occupied but a few minutes, and it came back to the House and became a law. In the last session of Congress the bill was reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and passed the House with but one single vote in the negative and without a single amendment offered to it. It passed the Senate substantially in the same way. It passed both the House and the Senate unchallenged and uncriticised. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania say the same of any appropriation bill that ever emanated from the Committee on Appropriations?

The fact of it is, that these bills had been so carefully considered by the Committee on Agriculture, that committee having such close relations with the Department of Agriculture, its individual members investigating and acquainting themselves with the working of every single division and bureau of that Department, that when this bill is perfected and presented here it commands the approbation of the House and passes without challenge.

But that is an agricultural appropriation bill. It affects the great agricultural interests of the country, and there are certain gentlemen upon the floor of this House who, when they look at any measure and can not see in it increased revenues or protection to some manufacturing industry, will not support it.

I claim that the distribution of these appropriation bills will result in no increased or extravagant expenditures, but, on the contrary, that we will have economical, well-considered, and intelligent appropriation bills, and further than that, this House will have the opportunity of giving them consideration. I have nothing in the world to say, and do not propose to say anything, that can be construed into a reflection upon the personnel of the Committee on Appropriations.

For some of the gentlemen on that committee I have the highest esteem and the warmest personal attachment, but I do not believe it is in the power of any fifteen men that can be selected in this House to properly consider all these appropriation bills and to give the House the opportunity of considering them too. I do not believe that any fifteen men of this House are so very much larger, either intellectually or in any other way, than any other fifteen men in the House. The fact is, since I became a member of the House of Representatives I have had more than one idol shattered. My experience is that these self-exalted great men of the House of Representatives grow small by degrees and beautifully less as you get close to them. For the benefit of some of the younger members, the new members who are here for the first time, I want to relate some of my experience in these matters.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] sound the note of alarm. They say that there is great danger in trusting any other fifteen men in this House than the fifteen placed on the Committee of Appropriations. Well, I undertake to say that it is utterly impossible that the ingenuity of man can suggest a change to these rules, so far as the appropriation bills are concerned, that will not be for the better. It is utterly impossible to make a set of rules worse than the set of rules we have been working under for the last two Congresses. I witnessed a scene here in the concluding hours of the last Congress that ought to put every member of this House to shame who will by his vote in any way render it possible that that scene shall ever be repeated again.

Let me give you the dates. Here is a bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on the 23d day of February, 1885, appropriating $22,200,177.22, and the House was asked on that late day in the session, the session closing by constitutional enactment on the 4th of March, to pass that bill under a suspension of the rules; and not one single item, except the two excepted in his original proposition, that any member of this House could have the opprtunity of amending or proposing to amend.

I do not care what may happen under this revision of the rules. A more vicious system of legislation can never be interjected into this House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that on that last night, between sundown on the 3d of March and 12 o'clock on the 4th of March, appropriation bills aggregating at least $50,000,000 or perhaps $100,000,000, passed this House without the opportunity of a single member having the chance to consider them or to offer an amendment. And, worse than that, the late President of the United States was compelled within a few moments of the end of his term to sign money bills appropriating and distributing nearly $100,000,000 of the people's money without ever reading the titles of the bills. He had no opportunity of considering them; he did not even know the titles of the bills which he signed, but simply signed them blindfold. But I give notice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and this House, that unless I am wofully mistaken you have a President of the United States now whom you can not blindfold and make sign bills appropriating fifty millions of the people's money without seeing their captions. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HATCH. I understood I had thirty-three minutes and I have only spoken about twenty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was entitled to twenty-three minutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. HATCH. I do not ask for an extension of time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] offered me five or ten minutes of his hour, and I ask the courtesy of having that time now so as to continue my remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. Where does the hour of the gentleman from Texas come in?

The SPEAKER. The next hour will be occupied by gentlemen in opposition to the report. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask that the gentleman from Missouri may have ten minutes additional time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the time of the gentleman from Missouri will be extended for ten minutes.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there is objection unless the time for closing general debate is extended.

Objection was made.

Mr. HATCH. I believe in the six years I have served in this House I have never failed to extend the courtesy I have now asked to every member that claimed it. I believe this is the first time in my Congressional life that I have asked the courtesy of an extension of ten minutes, and I am exceedingly obliged to the kindness of the gentlemen who have refused it.

Mr. CASWELL. I have not served long enough upon the Appropriations Committee to merit any degree of censure I trust, but I have served long enough to understand that these charges and this arraignment of that committee which have been made here upon the floor of this House are to a large extent unfounded and without justification.

There is a great portion of that report which I am not here to oppose; there are only two paragraphs in it to which I find objection; one is the distribution of the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee to several other committees; and the other is the readoption of that provision which permits the Appropriations Committee to ingraft upon appropriation bills the contingent expenses that may arise in the several Departments. So long as you retain that paragraph, so long you preserve the very cause of the mischief.

If the other amendments proposed by this committee had been adopted six years ago we would not have found ourselves in the dilemma in which we are to-day. As has been often and correctly said by members in this debate, the great mischief arises not from any mismanagement on the part of the Appropriations Committee, not from any excess of power that has been vested in them with reference to appropriations, but from this mischievous practice of ingrafting upon appropriation bills legislation in its various forms. I want to declare my opposition to placing upon an appropriation bill any legislation at all. Sir, upon my theory the Appropriations Committee should be divested of all authority to ingraft upon an appropriation bill and bring into the House any measures of legislation. Are gentlemen aware of the extent of this mischief?

Why, sir, the gentleman from Georgia who spoke yesterday in favor of the adoption of this report said that the great cause of the trouble here was the delay in presenting appropriation bills, and that this was owing to the legislation ingrafted upon them. I think he was right in his statement. Adopting the proposed amendment in this respect, we strike down this power of legislation on appropriation bills, and leave the Committee on Appropriations to perform its legitimate functions; nothing more. My idea is that the legislative committees of this House and the committee that metes out the money that is to execute these laws should be kept separate and distinct.

We listened yesterday to a very eloquent speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] upon the centralization of power. He seems to think that all power in this House under the rules as they have existed has been concentrated in the Appropriations Committee. I tell the gentleman I am opposed to the centralization of power as much as he, and I presume every member on this floor is opposed to it. But, sir, his proposition would centralize in eight or ten committees of this House not only legislative authority, but the authority to propose appropriations to execute the very laws they have framed.

Gentlemen talk about the arbitrary power of the Committee on Appropriations and the arbitrary manner in which it has been exercised. I wish to say to them that those charges are very much overstated and lack facts as a basis. Why, sir, we must place power in some of the departments of this House if we would carry on its business. I undertake to say that the Speaker of this House occupies a place which gives him more power than any other man this side of the Chief Executive of the Government, and properly so; otherwise he could not execute the duties of presiding officer of this great body of men, who are here trying to transact the public business. So it is necessary that whatever committee may have charge of the appropriations for the Government should have the right to present their bills and secure their passage in preference to other business; otherwise the whole machinery of the Government might be obstructed.

Why, sir, if this committee is authorized simply to audit the accounts of the Government and prepare the appropriation bills—nothing more—it has less power than many of the other committees on this floor; and I do not understand what gentlemen mean when they speak of all the wisdom of this House being embodied in the Appropriations Committee. What occasion have they to make such remarks? Why, sir, I presume there are gentlemen who have been members of the Appropriations Committee who could not perform the duties required upon the Judiciary Committee—who could not perform well the duties of a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. But that is no reason why we should say that the Judiciary Committee or the Naval Committee embodies the wisdom of the House. The question is simply whether we shall preserve a finance committee who shall pass upon all the great appropriations of this Government and provide for its expenditures. The question is not one of personnel at all, but whether we shall maintain at the gates of the Treasury a committee specially authorized to examine the disbursements of the several Executive Departments and see that they are kept within proper limits.

Some gentleman says that the principal objection to this power which the Committee on Appropriations has exercised is in the fact that they have without proper reason withheld from the House their appropriation bills. Is that true? Is there really any cause for that complaint? I think not. My able friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], in his eloquent speech of yesterday, confessed that on one occasion he exercised the power to hold back an appropriation bill. He confessed it partly in humiliation and partly in self-approval. Yet I undertake to say that his action on that occasion was perfectly justifiable, as all who were then here will remember.

The fact was simply this, that he held back the deficiency bill for the purpose of keeping here a quorum of the House; for on an appropriation bill, upon which the yeas and nays were required under the rules, there must be a quorum voting or the bill would fail. He held back that appropriation bill, with the approval of most of the members here, for the purpose of retaining a quorum on this floor. But, gentlemen, there was another reason, which he did not mention, for his holding back that bill. I remember well that the Ways and Means Committee of this House had then under consideration before the House, and had had for many days, the revision of the tariff, and the Appropriations Committee had not the power to take the floor from them. That was a good reason why the gentleman did not present the bill.

But, sir, if we turn to the record we will be greatly deceived as to the progress these appropriation bills have made from time to time in the House. Let us examine the charge that the appropriation bills have been held back. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] suggested the remedy of adopting a rule here in the short sessions that appropriation bills should be reported to the House by the 1st of February and in the long sessions by the 1st of March. What is the fact? What has been the practice of these committees?

Go with me to the Forty-seventh Congress. I find in the long session, which closed its labors on the 8th day of August, one bill was passed in January, two were passed in February, two in March, one in April, one in May, three in June, and two before the middle of July, leaving a full month of the session yet unexpired when the appropriation bills passed this House. Go with me to the second session. I find upon examination of the record before the holiday recess, before the 20th of December, there were four of the great appropriation bills passed by this House, one on the 7th, one on the 9th, one on the 13th, and one on the 20th of December—all before the holiday recess. During the time we have been here discussing these rules one-third of the great appropriation bills of the House had been passed through. Go with me further. During the month of January, namely, on the 4th, 5th, and 13th, and on the 20th, in all five of these appropriation bills were passed prior to the 21st day of January. Here are nine of the great appropriation bills of this House which had been considered and passed through and sent to the Senate by the 20th of January, leaving only three for subsequent consideration.

Then again on the 16th and 24th of February of the same session two of the remaining bills were passed, only one being held until the 1st day of March—the deficiency bill—which my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] so generously admits he held back for the purpose of showing to this House that the Appropriations Committee did have some little authority.

I ask if we should distribute these appropriation bills among seven or eight or ten committees is there any assurance that some of those committees would not for the same purpose hold back their bills until near the close of the session? Is it not only natural to suppose these committees, which have had before them a large amount of legislative duties, would hold back their appropriation bills until the close of the session, as they might wish to know the wants and necessities of their action in order they might be acquainted with the amount necessary to be expended for the execution of the laws reported by them for the action of the House?

Suppose further that all these five committees should take the same view and postpone the reporting of their appropriation bills until the expiring days of the session, would we not have a grand family of confusion on this floor? Would it not be better to delegate this entire authority to one committee, whose duty it should be to report appropriation bills and nothing more?

Why, gentlemen of this House complain this committee has had the power, and it exercised it, to keep back the appropriation bills until the last hours of the session, and in the next breath they tell us it has obstructed legislation during the whole session. Which of these statements is correct? Charges of this character seem to have taken hold of this House without parallel in the history of discussion.

I remember day before yesterday when the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] arraigned this Appropriations Committee for its neglect of the Navy, for its neglect of the great cities, and for its neglect of the commerce of the country. He said to us, and it seemed to meet with approval, "Why have you neglected to build up your Navy, why have you neglected to take care of your commerce on the high seas, why have you neglected to protect by your appropriations the great cities of the country?" Next comes the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who lays down the rule that the Appropriations Committee has no power to build a single new ship; that it has no power, as the rules exist, to inaugurate any new enterprise; that no appropriation can be reported unless authorized by previous law.

The gentleman from New York further stated it was the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs to inaugurate a system for building up a navy; that it was the duty of the Committee on Commerce to report legislation to revive our commerce; and that it was the duty of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report legislation in reference to all the circle of our diplomatic establishments. And then I say let them do that, and let the Secretaries of the different Departments send to the Committee on Appropriations their estimates and reports, and then, and not until then, would it be their duty to act.

But what further? Why, my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. REED], who by the recent action of this side of the House has been placed in the front rank, even the leadership of this House, and, if he is not within the bar of the House I shall regret it, for I want to call attention to the advice he is now giving us. After the strong arraignment made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] of the Appropriations Committee for not violating the rules of the House and reporting bills for the building up of the Navy, for extending the commerce and the protection of the cities, my distinguished friend said:

> I fully agree in the arraignment which the gentleman from West Virginia has made of the Committee on Appropriations which has left us without a fortification, which has left us without a navy, which has in no respect responded to the needs of the country.

That is the indorsement which our distinguished leader gives to the House, to our side of the House, on this floor, and yet it would be in direct violation of the rules had the committee done so, as has been fully explained by the gentleman from New York and as shown by the rule itself. Why, sir, we may well pause and stop to see whether we are to crystallize a code of rules which will perhaps govern this House for the next fifty years upon such glittering generalities as that. Why, in the language of Bob Ingersoll, permit me to ask, What is this you are telling us? [Laughter.] We are arraigned here for not violating the rules of the House, for not inaugurating a system of revival in the Navy, for not extending our commerce, for not building up our barracks, for not carrying on the different enterprises of this country in its great stride in growth and prosperity. Let me remind you, gentlemen, that it is the duty of these several law-making committees to furnish the law, and the Appropriations Committee will not, I think, be backward in appropriating money to execute the law.

Mr. BINGHAM (from his seat.) They do not get a hearing.

Mr. CASWELL. Why lay so much blame upon that committee? Strike down the authority under the present rules that govern this House, the privilege of presenting any kind of legislation upon their bills, and their work will be comparatively easy; their duties will be plain. Gentlemen talk about the committee being overwhelmed with labor while members who have watched the progress of this House for years will bear me witness that day after day we adjourn here because there is nothing to do or because the majority of the House do not care to proceed to the consideration of the business that would be in order.

There is no kind of trouble, as has been shown you here, of passing the appropriation bills within the proper time. I have shown you that four of them have been passed before the holiday recess and five more in the month of January following, and there is no occasion to say that that committee is so loaded down that it can not perform its duties. Why, sir, belittle its action by saying that the bills are submitted to a small subcommittee, who pass upon these great measures and report them to the House and have the management of them in the House and nobody else knows anything about it?

Why single out the Appropriations Committee and make this charge against it? Experience will tell you that in every large committee of the House the work is divided up among subcommittees; and I tell you, should these appropriations be distributed to the several committees named in the report, they, too, will delegate them to subcommittees appointed for the preparation of the bills, and they will come in here and be reported in the same way. But do not understand me to say that it is done without the full knowledge of the whole committee. They examine it all in detail by the rules of the House. The man that reports the bill, who has most investigated it, usually is the man who is entitled to the control of it upon the floor of the House. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the cause of all this complaint, in my judgment, is without foundation.

But, sir, while I am on the floor I desire to call the attention of the members of this House to another paragraph in that report. It is now proposed not only to distribute the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee in the way indicated, but it is proposed to revive an old amendment and attach it to the rules, which I think will be fraught with much mischief. I call your attention particularly to that clause which they now propose and which ingrafts upon the rule, after forbidding legislation in various forms, the general provision, "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

That was a rule that was adopted in the good old Democratic days of Andrew Jackson in 1836, and has been followed until the Forty-fourth Congress, when it was repealed after an unbroken line of precedents that under that paragraph, as it then existed, it was in order to move an amendment which should increase the salaries of officers of the Government. It never was controverted in any shape except in the Committee of the Whole in the case of the "salary grab," as it is termed, where by a bare majority, the committee voted against putting that construction upon it, but doubtless they were influenced and guided largely by the enormous steal that was then ingrafted upon the bill. But, sir, Speaker after Speaker held that under that paragraph it was in order to propose legislation to increase the salaries of the officers of this Government. Now they propose to ingraft upon the rules that govern this House that very dangerous clause. Why, sir, if I wanted to help the Democratic party out of power in this House I would support this measure. But I don't think they want my help at this time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Don't you want to help them out?

Mr. CASWELL. That may be, but I reserve that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Not by bankrupting the Government.

Mr. CASWELL. I do not believe it is our policy to dethrone the Democratic party by assisting them in their blunders. Better let us do it, as we shall do it, by the correctness of our own example. I am not here to lay snares for any person or party or to dig the pit in which to bury those gentlemen on the other side. Rather let us build monuments to the happiness and prosperity of the great American people. But I want to say I believe it my duty to warn you gentlemen that while doubtless you are correct in saying that it was the operation of the rules under Republican guidance and control in this House which was the cause of putting us out of power, the day may come when Providence or some unseen power will return it here for us to use for the same purpose.

We will understand how easy it is to stretch our imagination as to why these gentlemen are for the first time supporting this revision of the rules. But I want to warn you that in adopting this paragraph which they propose to put into the rules you enter upon a sea of darkness; you will be dependent wholly upon the construction the chairman of the Committee of the Whole may see fit to give you, and you have no ruling to guide you.

I ask the Committee on Rules, why did you not ingraft a paragraph so plain that we might read though we run? Why conceal the real interpretation of that rule? Is it because you covertly want to advance the interests of your own party by way of increasing the salaries now that you are in power? I do not charge that. I do not believe that was the purpose that actuated any member of that committee. I have too much respect for them to do so; but if they had cooly and deliberately intended to enact a paragraph upon the rules to permit them to advance the salaries of their officers who are holding positions under this Administration they could not have taken a better step than they have taken. I warn them again that the people of this country will not approve of such an act, and I am in favor of eliminating that proposed amendment from the rules. Otherwise I shall be pleased to support them.

You remove that great pit which we have had here since the Forty-fourth Congress into which all committee reports are dumped, if you please. Remove that from these rules and provide, as this revision will provide, that we may sometimes go to the Calendar of the House and take up measures for enactment. You will then have no cause to complain that the Appropriations Committee are obstructing the legislation of this House. When you do that do you not saddle the blame on the wrong shoulders? It has been the practice here since the adoption of this rule for committee after committee to report its business and have it put upon the Calendar, where it is destined to slumber during the remainder of the Congress.

Let us remove that obstruction and let the Appropriations Committee go on with the discharge of their proper functions relating to the financial business of the Government. Give them no power of legislation. Delegate that to the other great committees of the House. Keep these two elements separate.

I have great respect for the Committee on Rules, but it has unfortunately, although composed of different members from time to time, proposed rules which have done more to defeat legislation than the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The Committee on Appropriations is the result of the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules made the Committee on Appropriations and gave it its powers.

Mr. CASWELL. Let the reporting of appropriations be lodged in whosesoever hands it may, wherever there is found an appropriation bill there must be lodged in the committee having charge of it the power to move it at any time when the majority will consent, but never without that consent. Only in that way can you insure its passage.

Why, sir, one would think, to listen to this discussion, that there have been no laws passed in this Congress for many years. But notwithstanding the fact that thousands of bills have been reported and thrown into this great pool from which they could never be resurrected—notwithstanding that, I see that during the last Congress there were 695 general bills passed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not mean to say that that number of public bills were passed?

Mr. CASWELL. That is precisely what I mean.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CASWELL. I think I am not, for I examined the statutes. The number of the last chapter shows that there were 695, and I could see no chapter omitted. In addition to that there were 850 bills of a private nature that passed also.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. CASWELL. Certainly; if I am in error I desire to be set right.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Of the 996 bills which became laws in the last Congress 682, or nearly two-thirds of the whole, were of a private character, and of these 588 were pension bills.

Mr. CASWELL. That may be true as regards the last session of Congress. For that session I think that is about true, and I ask my friend if he does not refer to the last session?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I refer to the last Congress.

Mr. CASWELL. If you will take the Statutes at Large you will find the last general chapter is the last of six hundred and ninety-five laws of a general nature; and you will find there were eight hundred and eighty and odd bills of a private nature. On examination I found a few numbers were skipped. That is the result of my investigation. Perhaps I am wrong. If I am I will take great pleasure in being corrected.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is fair to state that I have read from an article prepared by the Journal Clerk of this House and printed in The Current, published at Chicago December 5, 1885.

Mr. CASWELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have given the result of my own personal observation; and I freely invite every member on this floor to investigate for himself whether I am not correct in the figures I have given.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we did not pass one hundred bills, it is not because the Appropriations Committee has obstructed their passage; it is because bills have been buried upon the Calendar, and under the rules of the House could not be taken up. I am glad to hail the day when we have before us an amendment which will permit us, after the morning hour, to proceed to the Calendar and take up such bills as the committee entitled to the floor may see fit to have considered for one or two successive days.

But, notwithstanding this privilege, it is for the interest of the House, it is for the interest of the Government, it is a matter of imperative necessity that sufficient time should be given to the Appropriations Committee to prepare their bills and have them considered in the House. Remember that at all times when they seek the floor for the passage of these bills it is within the power of the majority, if they wish, to prevent their consideration. Nothing is done against the will of the majority.

I can not for my part see the reason for this grave arraignment of that committee. I can not see any reason why we should depart from this long-established precedent, indorsed by all civilized nations, which places the appropriations for the Government under the supervision of a single committee; and if this precedent be reversed I predict for this House confusion unparalleled in the history of our legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am reminded that my time is passing, and I desire to yield a portion to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]. I now yield to him.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, how much of the hour remains?

The SPEAKER. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. RYAN. I do not care to occupy the attention of the House for only seventeen minutes. In that time I could not say what I wish to say. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has other friends to whom he may desire to yield the time, I will waive my right.

Mr. CASWELL. Then I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY].

Mr. MCKINLEY. I yield the time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, this debate is tedious, but it accomplishes something. We are making the issue simple. We all agree that the majority of the House ought to control its legislation and that the other amendments will accomplish this result. But when we come to the amendment which would arm five new committees with the power to report appropriation bills and with the privileges belonging to that power and challenge the proposition with the questions, Will it dispatch business? Will it be without harm to the public interest? we get different answers, and so we reach different conclusions. But because this difference divides both sides of the House, it is a difference not of party but of conviction, and such a difference is one which excuses and often rewards discussion. Only we, who oppose the distribution of appropriations, can not claim that our objections are new. They are old, but they have not lost their strength. They have been used both in House and Senate whenever this proposition has been up, and used to defeat it. They have not been answered. I do not believe they can be answered; and my belief turned to knowledge when the gentleman from Maine looked respectfully at them, played on them with his wit, but refused to touch them with his reason.

What are these objections? The first is that it takes out of our parliamentary system the only body whose duty it is to take charge of the appropriations as a whole. It removes the only body that supervises, regulates, and controls the sum total of expenditures—the whole amount of the appropriations. And the result is that we have nobody that knows, and what is worse nobody that cares, what these sums are. So there is no place where we can go to get this information and no place where we can go and place this responsibility. It is a system without a sun, a confederacy without a federal center, a union of states without a national government.

But the friends of distribution say "the responsibility will rest with the House, and all its members will be made—as they ought to be—responsible for this high duty." What kind of responsibility? Responsibility grows by concentration; is weakened by dispersion. This responsibility, when shared by us all, will rest so lightly on the shoulders of each that it will exercise no check; and light as its weight is, each of us will toss it off with the jaunty assertion, "I voted with the committee."

But while there will be nobody that knows and nobody that is responsible for the whole amount of the appropriations, there will be nobody that can adjust and control the relations which the different appropriations made by these different committees shall bear to each other and to the income of the Government.

There will be no equalizing board to fix these ratios. And the Government, without anybody to know and equalize and control the total of its appropriations, will soon discover that its expenditures will outrun its income and that it is taking the first step on the road to bankruptcy.

Another objection is the assurance that this new system of appropriations is pregnant at every point with tendencies and temptations to lavish expenditure. The new committeeman is assigned to his subject. He gives to the subject time and thought. Under the rules that govern the human mind this devotion creates interest. He magnifies his subject—looks at it so earnestly that he loses sight of the other subjects about it, and conceives an exaggerated opinion of its relative importance. In the end he is conscientious in his conviction that this subject is the most important of any that engages the attention of Congress.

Next comes in the measure that shall develop this subject. He creates or promotes the measure. Perhaps it gets his name—certainly his reputation and success are identified with it—and he soon acquires, and for the same reasons, an exaggerated opinion of the value of the measure, and finally believes it to be the most important measure that can come before Congress. As if this was not enough to secure a generous appropriation, we have the influence of the Department. The Speaker, in selecting the member, considered his tastes and temperament in connection with the officials he would have to meet in the Department, and did right in doing so. The relations between the Department and the member become friendly and cordial, and he keeps the approbation of the Department when he makes generous provision for its needs.

And as if this was not running the whole gauntlet of such temptation, when the committeeman comes out into the House he finds his fellow-members all working with zeal in their respective committees. He wants to do as well for his committee as they do for theirs, and a friendly contest is inaugurated, where victory is claimed by the one who does best for his committee; and that proposition, when expressed in its simplest terms, is, get the largest appropriations. Under these circumstances, can there be any wonder if the new system of appropriations should lead to extravagance?

Generally before this point is reached in the argument the friends of divided appropriations ask, with more rhetoric than force, "Are there only fifteen men in the House you can trust?" And I answer promptly, "There are three hundred and twenty-five. I trust the three hundred and twenty-five as I trust the fifteen; but no more. I would trust the fifteen on a single committee of appropriations, and I would trust any other fifteen of our number; but I would not trust this fifteen on different committees of appropriations, nor any other fifteen of us. The question is not the difference between different men, but the difference between the same men under different circumstances."

Now if you ask me if I do not think this is excessive power to be given to a single committee, I answer, "Yes;" but I add: "This excessive power has to be placed somewhere, in some body, and, according to all theory and practice heretofore, in a single body. And no better repository has yet been discovered for it. Certainly this committee suggests none." And if you ask me again, "Does not this excessive power tend to abuse?" I answer, "Yes;" and go further by saying, "It not only tends, but does." And if further asked, "Do not these privileges tempt the fortunate fifteen to errors in manners and in act?" Again I answer, "Yes;" and add: "It not only tempts to but produces errors in manners and in fact." And then I insist that all this abuse and all these errors will not be nearly so harmful as the inevitable consequences of the change proposed. The old method offers the less of two evils. But with all the dangers that seem to be threatened by the proposition to distribute the appropriations, it does not seem to me it will help us to dispatch business. Take our single Committee of Appropriations. We have given it the right of way, and, to enable it to use its power, have exhausted our parliamentary skill to supply it with every weapon that would aid it to get its rights, and yet——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired. There are forty minutes of the time for general debate remaining, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania presenting the minority report is entitled to twenty.

Mr. MILLS. What has become of the hour I was to have?

The SPEAKER. It has gone with the hours of many other gentlemen. After the gentleman from Pennsylvania has exhausted twenty minutes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] will have twenty minutes to close the debate.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, if the members of this House who have heretofore held position on the Appropriations Committee were to consult their own ease I do not doubt that they would yield up the duty that is proposed to be taken from that committee, in case they were selected again to serve upon it, without a murmur. But there is a graver and more far-reaching effect in the proposition as presented than the mere convenience of a member or his ability to perform labor. I knew always, as every member who has ever served on that committee knows, that in the effort to resist undue appropriations we were engaged in a thankless task; but I never knew that there would be those in public stations who would rise on this floor and condemn a man or set of men who were engaged in the laudable purpose of saving from wasteful expenditure the public money.

We meet condemnation, and that has been meted out here in large measure. But I trust that the representatives of the people who here surround me will rise above any feeling of bias. I am quite aware that the pet measures of many members have been interfered with by the rigid necessity of passing appropriation bills before an adjournment could take place. And in the instance that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] cites I will say it was a great public exigency when I asked on this floor during the last session of Congress that the sundry civil bill might be passed under a suspension of the rules; and I never have had cause to regret that I asked an exception to be made in that instance. For, mark you, the issue at that time was between provision before the adjournment for carrying on the Government after the 4th of March or a new administration with an extra session of Congress on its hands. I was willing to do anything to prevent an extra session. I believed that no greater peril could come to my party and no greater wrong and injury could result to the country.

It has come to be the fashion in Congress that every proposition which does not meet with favor or does not secure a hearing has its defeat attributed to the Appropriations Committee. I will illustrate the incorrectness of that statement when I tell you that the Appropriations Committee at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, as shown by the record, in the consideration of their entire twelve bills, occupied but one-sixth of the time of the House; and very little more, if I included the printed speeches on the tariff, than was consumed by the tariff bill at that session.

It has been suggested—perhaps not here but elsewhere—that the Appropriations Committee interfered with the consideration of revenue measures. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] states, as I think to his discredit, that upon one occasion to execute a policy he found it incumbent upon him to thrust in appropriation bills to accomplish his end. I submit that as to the tariff, as to the river and harbor bill, as to the interstate-commerce bill, the Appropriations Committee never did interpose except when it was essential that Congress should pass appropriation bills prior to adjournment.

The river and harbor bill took one-third as much time in the House in the session to which I allude as did the twelve appropriation bills. True, an appropriation bill has the right of way. It has the right of way properly. But it has not the right of way to the disadvantage of revenue measures. Revenue measures have precedence by the rules, and have the first right to be considered. The Appropriations Committee is a committee formed in my judgment only for the purpose of examination and recommendation to this body. It is by this body that the final voice is to be given, and the Appropriations Committee could be halted at any moment if a majority of this House saw fit to stop it in its course of procedure.

I have said that the Appropriations Committee from time immemorial, or certainly during my experience in Congress, has brought upon itself complaints in every direction because of the fact that it does of necessity interfere with bills in the hands of other members. But it has never, so far as I have known, departed from the established purpose, as I have stated. Let me make my language plainer. If I understand the rule of the committee it always adopts for guidance in the conduct of its business the same course the Speaker does in the appointment of committees—it enforces the policy of its party. The policy which the Committee on Appropriations has adopted when under the control of this side of the House has been one of economy. And I fail to find anywhere in declarations either of national conventions or of conventions of my party in the several States an instance where that was not the principal and main enunciation of what we wanted to do if the people would intrust us with power.

I was a little surprised yesterday, and I confess to some regret, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] in the discussion raised the question and indicated what is to come, in my judgment, as the effect of the change of these rules. For myself I have in a large degree been educated in the same school of politics as the gentleman from Texas. The statement of the gentleman struck me with great surprise when I saw its significance and took into consideration whence it came—the statement that we were about to enter upon a new departure as to the manner of making up appropriation bills.

I came here during the war; I am not going to refer to what was my course of conduct during that immediate period; but when the war was over I wanted that we should go straight back to a strict construction of the Constitution, permitting only that exercise of Federal authority which was distinctly given to us and reserving in every particular everything that belonged to the States. One of the propositions which I stated then, and have often stated since, was that I wished the Federal Government to do nothing in the way of legislation that could be as well done by the State authority; and if I was addressing a body composed of my fellow-citizens, I would deliberately say that I want neither the Federal nor the State authorities to do anything that could be as well or better done by the people in their immediate localities.

I made the assertion that the war had produced two principal results: it had abolished slavery, and it had put an end to the thought and doctrine of secession. There I stopped. Those ends having been accomplished, I wanted to rehabilitate the States in all their prior authority. The gentleman from Texas and I have both read the principles of the founder of the Democracy. Among those teachings I have found Thomas Jefferson in substance declaring that there should be no money appropriated for any purpose unless in pursuance of direct authority in the Constitution of the United States to that end.

This doctrine, in my action as a member of the Appropriations Committee, has been my guide. If members of this House will but follow that rule there will be no need of controversy as to river and harbor bills; for who is there that would not vote for a river and harbor bill if it was brought within the purview of the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, when it declared that a river, to be considered navigable, must be able to float a vessel of at least twenty tons burden? It is not legitimate appropriations for rivers and harbors that anybody objects to, but the provisions outside of the Constitution of the United States which are put into such bills. We have no right to collect taxes to be distributed in that way.

I remember very well an enunciation of the late candidate of gentlemen on the other side for President of the United States, when he proposed that the surplus funds in the Treasury of the Government should be distributed among the States. What was the people's response to that? It was that this Government possesses no power to take from the people of the United States taxes to be distributed among the States; and a greater objection to such a system is that it would make, in my opinion, the States the vassals of the Federal Government, which they were never intended to be.

The gentleman from Texas with great ability has given us the real issue involved in this controversy; for I can not for a moment bring myself to think that there is any individual bias or hostility toward those who have been members of the Appropriations Committee. He tells us that we must find out how much money is needed to be expended—in other words, for what expenditures we shall be able to secure the concurrence of the two Houses—and then we must raise the revenue accordingly. This, to my mind, would lead to enlarged appropriations and a loose construction, and I think a most dangerous departure from past practice. I agree it is in large degree involved in the propositions now before the House, but I did not expect that either side of this House would be prepared to give sanction to such a declaration. I beg, therefore, that members will stop and consider what we are entering upon.

I do not say that one set of men are abler than another, or possess more integrity of purpose than another. I have rarely seen the time when I even ventured to surmise that any man on this floor was actuated by any other than the purest motives. In resisting this proposition I act from a high sense of duty, because I believe that by its adoption we would enter upon a dangerous field in the appropriation of the public money. I hope no one will assume that I do not think my neighbor as good in every respect as I am. In fact I am inclined to believe that in my course here I oftentimes need the kindly judgment of my fellow-members, for I am frequently provoked to say things which upon mature judgment I might not say; but I do know that I have never uttered a word which would reflect at all, directly or indirectly, upon the motives or the integrity of any of my associates on this floor. At the same time I affirm with positiveness that to distribute these bills is to take from them that unity and harmony of action which are essential to the legislation of every party in power that it may meet the requirements of the pledges which placed it in power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is now entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman allow me one statement?

Mr. MORRISON. I have given my time to a gentleman on the other side of the House.

Mr. WELLBORN. I desire but a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Have I no time to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN]?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRISON. In consideration of the fact that the last hour occupied on the other side of the House was in opposition to the committee's report made by me, and in support of which I had already spoken, I promised to give to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] the twenty minutes yet remaining for general debate. I now ask to take back two of them; and in these two minutes I desire to say that the assumption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that anybody finds fault with the Appropriations Committee, or any gentleman who has been a member of it, because it has helped to reduce expenditures, is largely gratuitous. Why, sir, our Chaplain without eyes has not followed his God more blindly than I have followed the Committee on Appropriations in every reduction it has proposed or attempted to make in these last twelve years.

Mr. RANDALL. And I hate to part with you now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. And the assumption that you will part with me is equally gratuitous and unfounded. And the inference sought to be drawn by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the presentation of the proposed amendments to the rules that anybody who has participated in making this report has for his purpose the increase of expenditures or that the adoption of this report will have that effect is altogether unwarranted. It has no fact to rest on and is assertion only.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, it had been my purpose in the beginning to allude to some features of the report of the Committee on Rules which in this discussion have been entirely overlooked, but the limited time at my disposal compels me to confine my remarks to that portion of the report which has been the subject of the severest criticism, namely, the distribution of the appropriation bills.

If there was no other reason for distributing the appropriation bills than to break the despotic power of the Committee on Appropriations, that power, I grant you, which has molded the legislation of previous Congresses, I very much question whether the proposed amendment will accomplish that result.

You only take from the Appropriations Committee half its power. You yet leave it armed with six great appropriation bills. You leave with that committee still the power to control in no small degree the legislation of this House. I am not certain but you multiply the difficulty by making it necessary to contend against the machinations of seven committees instead of one, and I should be inclined to agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that we had better endure the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of.

But I favor the distribution of these bills for other and, to my mind, weightier reasons. I believe in the distribution of these bills, first, because they will be better considered in committee; and, second, because a larger number of the members of the House will be made familiar with their details, and the House itself better informed of their general character.

Now, I affirm they will be better considered, because they will be placed in the hands of committees which have the subjects for which appropriations are required particularly in charge. To illustrate: The Speaker in making up the committees of this House will place on the Committee on Military Affairs gentlemen who have had some experience in military matters, who have been in the Army and know something of the needs and hardships of the service, and in making appropriations for the support of the Army will have some regard for the comfort of the soldier in field and in camp. The Speaker in making up the Committee on Foreign Affairs will select, if there is a member of the House who has been in the foreign service, such a member to be placed on that committee. Will not that committee so constituted be better prepared to make the necessary appropriations for the support of the foreign service than the Committee on Appropriations? What I have said in relation to these two committees may be affirmed in regard to all the others. And what, in a word, can be more appropriate than to place in the hands of committees which have special branches of the service in charge and constantly in mind the appropriations for their support?

Then, too, it will from necessity make a larger membership of the House familiar with the details of appropriation bills. Every gentleman who has served on the Committee on Appropriations—and I have had that honor—knows how the appropriation bills are prepared in that committee. The Committee on Appropriations, let me say here, would not object to the distribution of the bills if, when prepared, they were to be reported back to the Committee on Appropriations; but the real objection to this change is that it proposes these bills shall be reported directly to the House, and not to the Committee on Appropriations, for the Committee on Appropriations itself, from necessity, parcels out these bills or distributes them to subcommittees. I hold in my hand a list of twelve committees in the last Congress made up from the membership of the Appropriations Committee, to which were assigned the several appropriation bills. Let me call attention to them:

Subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress.

Legislative, executive, and judicial—Messrs. Holman, Hancock, and Cannon.

Sundry civil—Messrs. Randall, Forney, and Ryan.

Army—Messrs. Forney, Townshend, and Keifer.
Navy—Messrs. Hutchins, Randall, and Calkins (Long, second session).
Post-Office—Messrs. Townshend, Holman, and Horr.
Indian—Messrs. Ellis, Holman, and Ryan.
Consular and diplomatic—Messrs. Burnes, Townshend, and Washburn.
Pension—Messrs. Hancock, Follett, and Washburn.
Military Academy—Messrs. Keifer, Forney, and Ellis.
District of Columbia—Messrs. Follett, Hutchins, and Cannon.
Deficiencies—Messrs. Randall, Burnes, and Calkins (Long, second session).
Fortifications—Messrs. Ellis, Hoar, and Hancock.

These subcommittees, each consisting of three members of the Committee on Appropriations, take in charge the bill assigned to them. They formulate it in the quiet of their apartments, away from the full committee, and gentlemen who are interested in that particular appropriation are called and heard by the subcommittee.

When the bill is formulated thus, it is reported to the full committee. It is then read, it is true, to the full committee, but the subcommittee is relied upon for all knowledge of the details of that bill. And outside of these three gentlemen composing the subcommittee and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who is supposed to be familiar with the details of all the bills—I say, outside of the subcommittee and the chairman of the Whole Committee, there is no general knowledge of the details of that bill. The subcommittee report the bill to the House, and the chairman of the subcommittee stands sponsor for it upon the floor of the House. If by accident the members of that subcommittee are not present when the bill is called up for consideration in Committee of the Whole, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations asks that the consideration of the bill may be postponed until the members of the subcommittee, the gentlemen having it in charge, can be present.

So, I say these bills are already distributed; and so, in conclusion on this point, instead of having three members familiar with the details of an appropriation bill, you will have under this distribution proposed a committee of fifteen members considering each bill item by item, and standing sponsors for it before the House.

If the proposed modification is adopted and six of the appropriation bills are sent to six different committees, you will have, instead of eighteen members, ninety members of the House familiar with all the details of these six appropriation bills.

One word about the objection to this part of the report. It is insisted that the distribution of these bills will increase expenditures. That is an assumption. Bear in mind that all legislation upon appropriation bills is to be done away with, for we all agree upon that. The appropriations then must be made within the terms of existing law. How can there be then any serious increase of expenditures? But is the Committee on Appropriations the only committee to be trusted in the matter of expenditures? Is there no spirit or purpose of economy with the majority now in power, outside of the Committee on Appropriations and its former distinguished chairman? Are the apprehensions of the people to be thus early realized that the majority are here simply devoted to the "old flag and an appropriation," and that there is no arm powerful enough to beat back the hungry horde but that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Is that true? Is there no pilot of sufficient capacity on the other side of the Chamber to guide the affairs of this Administration in safety over even undisturbed waters? Is that to be conceded? I mistake very much the temper and character of the gentlemen composing the majority of this House if thus early they publicly confess their incompetency and profligacy and apply for the appointment of a guardian. [Laughter.] Who doubts but that, if the gentleman from Indiana, representing the fourth district [Mr. HOLMAN], is at the head of a committee having in charge an appropriation bill, he will guard the Treasury with as much fidelity as the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

But it is cited that the agricultural bill has been increased in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania filed his brief in advance of the argument to the effect that the appropriation had been increased for that Department. But that proves nothing. He must go further and demonstrate that the Committee on Appropriations would never have made that increased appropriation. Are you prepared to say you would not have voted $150,000 for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry? True, the appropriations have been increased, but they are not extravagant. The present Commissioner of Agriculture calls for the next fiscal year for an increase of $70,000 over what was appropriated for the present fiscal year. So he commends what we have done. Why, in the beginning the Department of Agriculture had an appropriation of only $1,000, and for many years it fluctuated from $1,000 and nothing, and the whole Department for many years was a clerkship in the Patent Office. In 1862 it was made a Department of the Government, and for thirty-three years the total amount of the appropriations made for it was less than two and a half millions of dollars. Its expenses were necessarily enlarged. While the present Commissioner of Agriculture, in an address delivered in Chicago less than a month ago, said that with $20,000 in his hand he could have arrested the spread of disease among the great herds of Missouri, but instead of that it went on until it cost that State more than $2,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, there is an economy that is extravagance. There is a parsimony that approaches crime. But they tell us that the Ways and Means Committee are looking to the resources of the Government, and we must have one committee—we must have one committee looking toward expenditures as a corresponding committee with the Committee on Ways and Means, which committees must stand back to back, one looking one way and one the other. Let me ask is not the Book of Estimates in the hands of every member of the House? Do gentlemen suppose that all knowledge of the resources of this Government and its needed expenditures is contained in the Committee on Appropriations? Is it not known to every member of the House that the estimated expenditures of this Government for the next fiscal year are $340,000,000, and the estimated revenue only $315,000,000? Is not that well known? Why, sir, there would be no increased expenditures, for all must see what would immediately occur. The moment the bills are distributed the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will confer with the chairmen of the several other committees having appropriations in charge; they will consult together and agree how much each bill should carry, in order to bring the expenditures within the resources of the Government.

And now, sir, in conclusion a word. As my friend from Illinois said to the members of the House on this side; he cautioned the members of the House how they should vote on this question; let me caution you also. There are many new members here; you do not know what these old rules will impose upon you. Let me say to this side of the House that the day of deliverance from the oppression of the old rules is at hand. You understand what these old rules mean, and if you vote for them it is a self-organized tyranny; and if hereafter the chains gall do not complain; it is your deliberate act. [Applause.]

I trust, however, that this House will break these fetters, assert its manhood and its individual freedom, the freedom of the membership of this House, and adopt a code of rules which comports with the spirit of our institutions and the dignity and intelligence of this body, and enable the House of Representatives to meet in some slight degree the expectations of an enlightened constituency. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. According to the understanding had this morning, debate under the hour rule is now closed and the Clerk will proceed to read the report by clauses. If there be no objection the Clerk will read only those clauses which it is proposed to amend.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask whether the Speaker means that the Clerk shall skip those paragraphs which are proposed to be amended by the report. I suggest that amendments may be offered to paragraphs which the committee do not propose to amend.

The SPEAKER. It may perhaps be as well then for the Clerk to read the whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

[The amendments proposed by the committee are to omit the words in brackets and insert the words printed in italics.]

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives in force at the close of the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress be the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress, with the following amendments, viz:

RULE I.

Amend clause 3, Rule I, as follows:

3. He shall have general control, except as provided by rule or law, of the Hall of the House, and [the disposal of] of the corridors and passages and the unappropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the use of the House until further order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule X as follows:

RULE X.

OF COMMITTEES.

1. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint, at the commencement of each Congress, the following standing committees, namely:
On Elections, to consist of fifteen members.
On Ways and Means, to consist of thirteen members.
On Appropriations, to consist of fifteen members.
On the Judiciary, to consist of fifteen members.
On Banking and Currency, to consist of thirteen members.
On Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to consist of [eleven] thirteen members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to know whether it is the intention of the gentleman having charge of the report that when a clause is read by the Clerk and no amendment offered it shall be understood that that clause is agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. That is my understanding.

The SPEAKER. But of course a vote will be taken on the whole report.

Mr. CANNON. The vote will be taken on the whole proposed substitute?

The SPEAKER. Of course. All the rules of procedure of the House will be observed.

The amendment last read was agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 2, line 20, strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty-one;" so that it will read:
"On Appropriations, to consist of twenty-one members."

I set very small store by this amendment. But inasmuch as other committees have been increased, quite a number of them, and the Committee on Appropriations is small, and, indeed, no larger than many other committees, it occurs to me as best that its number be increased to twenty-one. That is a good number, because it gives the proportion of about twelve of the dominant party to nine of the other, which has been the rule, I believe, hitherto on both sides of the House.

There are twelve bills, and this change will give a larger scope for the distribution of bills between subcommittees. We all know all the work done in Congress by all the committees is first submitted to subcommittees. The Committee on Claims usually refers a bill to a subcommittee of one, and then the general committee passes on it.

As I have said, I set very small store by this matter, but it occurs to me as proper that while we are increasing other committees we should also increase this one.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Commerce, to consist of fifteen members.
On Rivers and Harbors, to consist of fifteen members.
On Agriculture, to consist of fifteen members.
On Foreign Affairs, to consist of thirteen members.
On Military Affairs, to consist of thirteen members.
On Naval Affairs, to consist of [eleven] thirteen members.

Mr. HATCH. I offer as an amendment to the amendment the following:

Add to line 27 the following: "and one Delegate;" so that it will read:
"On Agriculture, to consist of fifteen Members and one Delegate."

Mr. HOLMAN. That has been passed.

Mr. HATCH. We have not passed the paragraph.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that there is a clause further on where representation of Delegates on committees is provided for.

Mr. HATCH. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The amendment of the committee to line 30 was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to consist of fifteen members.
On the Public Lands, to consist of [eleven] thirteen members.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Indian Affairs, to consist of [eleven] thirteen members.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the Territories, to consist of thirteen members.
On Railways and Canals, to consist of [eleven] thirteen members.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to move an amendment to this clause, and also to a subsequent line; I propose to strike out the words "railways and," so that this shall be a committee on canals. And further on, in line 44, I shall move to strike out the word "Pacific," so that there will be one Committee on Railroads and one Committee on Canals. I propose now first to strike out the words "railways and;" so that it will read: "on Canals, to consist of thirteen members."

There is no use, it seems to me, for two committees on railroads. This House has something to do with those railroads which have received subsidies from the Government, but other railroads are merely State creations, and we have nothing to do with them except in so far as their business concerns interstate commerce, and over that commerce the Committee on Commerce has jurisdiction. Therefore I see no reason why railroads generally and canals should be intrusted to the same committee, for it is well known to every gentleman on this floor that the railroads are opposed to the canals, and that the canals have nothing in common with railroads. Why, then, undertake to couple these inconsistent and warring elements in one committee?

I hope this amendment will be agreed to. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it has nothing specially to do with the Hennepin Canal [laughter], because the committee as it will be constituted at any rate will have jurisdiction of the subject under the head of canals. The object is simply to separate these two subjects. But even if the proposition had relation to the Hennepin Canal, it would be an additional reason why the amendment should be adopted. Under a subsequent clause this Committee on Canals would have the right during the new morning hour which is provided for to call up from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union any bill that it had previously reported. It would have this power at any rate, unless the Speaker, constituting the committee so as to represent the railroads, should smother the canals, which I do not believe he intends to do, and which he did not do in the last Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. While my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] has said that his amendment has nothing whatever to do with the Hennepin Canal, I should be very glad to have this or some other rule of the House so amended that it would have something to do with that canal; and I now give notice that if this motion to amend shall be voted down, I will move to strike out the words "and canals," so that this committee will then be the Committee on Railroads exclusively. My reason for this proposition has been already indicated by my colleague, that there are no relations existing between railroads and canals which make it consistent to confer jurisdiction of these two subjects upon the same committee, for they are in fact hostile and antagonistic to each other. We have heard it stated during this discussion by gentlemen on both sides of the House that our rivers and water ways are the great regulators of railway charges and the means of securing cheaper transportation. We are voting millions of dollars every Congress to improve the Mississippi River, the Tennessee River, the Alabama River, the Arkansas River, and various other rivers all over the country, even including the Big Sandy in West Virginia, for the express purpose of giving to the people increased facilities for transportation and of keeping within reasonable limits the charges made by railroads for transportation.

During the ten years that I have had the honor of a seat in this House a great deal has been said about laws for regulating the charges of railroads, and it has been generally conceded by eminent gentlemen who have discussed the subject that nothing will so effectually regulate railway charges and cheapen transportation as to give increased facilities for navigation by improving the water ways of this country.

In England, unfortunately, the railroads of that country were given some years ago the control of the canals and water ways; and a few years ago the English board of trade, which, unlike our boards of trade, is a part of the executive administration of the government, resolved that the control of the canals and water ways of England and Ireland should be taken from the railroads; in other words, that the canals and water ways should be divorced from the railways, it having been found necessary to do so in order to cheapen transportation even in that country, where there is a commission constituted by law with judicial powers conferred upon it for the regulation of railroads and for the purpose of preventing unjust discriminations and unreasonable charges.

Now, I repeat what I said at the beginning of these remarks, that there are no relations existing between railways and canals which justify giving jurisdiction over subjects relating to them to the same committee; and the canals ought to be placed within the control of that committee which has jurisdiction over the rivers and other water ways of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I hope we shall now have a vote, and that the amendment of my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] will be voted down.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Railways and Canals has been in existence for years, and no harm, so far as I know, has resulted from bringing these two subjects under the supervision of a single committee. I suggest it is very proper that the canals should watch the railroads and the railroads watch the canals.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I greatly agree with the expression used by my friend on my right that the Committee on Railways and Canals have given offense to no one, because they have done nothing. I know that the bills introduced in this House, and which have been referred to it, have slept the sleep of peace from the time they were introduced until the time they were reported. They have remained on our Calendars without action. I distinctly remember that I reported a bill in favor of the Hennepin Canal. [Laughter.] That committee made a unanimous report on the 10th of January, 1883, and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and when we adjourned it was number 20, the same that it was on the day it was reported. [Laughter]. Now what we say is this, that we are entitled to some little respect and attention; but when we have tried for years to get that attention and respect through the channel of the Committee on Railways and Canals we have failed. Therefore, would it not be right for us to pursue some other and different course? I was pleased, therefore, when the Speaker ruled at the last session of Congress that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had jurisdiction of the celebrated Hennepin Canal project. I believe it has to-day, and I hope when presented at this session it will meet with no objection on that score.

Will any gentlemen tell me there is no harmony between rivers, canals, and the improvement of rivers and harbors? Are they not all water ways?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Some of the streams for which appropriations have been made by the River and Harbor Committee are not water ways in any sense of the term. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURPHY. That may be true, but perhaps the gentleman himself was the cause of it. I do not know how that may be; I do not say that he or I have not committed blunders or committed wrongs at times; but I will say this, that the water ways in my judgment ought all to be under one administration, because they are cognate to each other. They ought not to go to the Committee on Railroads when we know that railroads are hostile to water ways. And that is why we desire this change. Then this conflict of jurisdiction would be removed. I hope and trust the House in considering this matter will give it that consideration it merits, and that when we present in the river and harbor bill, as we shall, a proposition asking for an appropriation for the Hennepin Canal there will be no technical objection made against it as to the jurisdiction of the committee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred on Mr. SPRINGER'S amendment, and there were—ayes 94, noes 103.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "and canals." In my former remarks I said that two years ago a motion had been made by the board of trade, which is part of the executive of the Queen's Government, to divorce canals from railroads. I will read that resolution, and ask gentlemen to listen to it:

That in order that commerce and agriculture may be able to take every advantage of the easily and cheaply worked traffic of the canals of Great Britain and Ireland, it is greatly to be desired that canals be entirely emancipated from the control of the railway companies. The traffic on them requires no organization like that on railways, and hence should be free from the control of the railroad companies as the high roads now are, thus making canals here what they are in other countries, namely, the cheapest means of conveying goods and agricultural products to market, and not the obstructive instruments of railway companies.

[Cries of "Vote! "Vote!"]

Mr. WILLIS. I think the object of the House is to give to each committee something to do. We have now, and have had for many years, a committee known as the Committee on Railroads and Canals. So far as the subject of railroads is concerned, it is one branch of that committee which has been called upon to do but little; but the other branch is one which in past Congresses has had ample work to do. If this Congress proposes to enter upon the work of constructing these canals, bills for which will be soon pending before this body, it will require or ought to have a committee with entire jurisdiction over that subject. There are to-day great canal schemes which will be presented to this Congress, and which involve the expenditure of large sums of money, which deserve the fullest and amplest consideration by the representatives of the people. There is a great canal proposed across the isthmus of Florida, and which was sought to be passed by the chairman of the committee on Railroads and Canals at the last Congress. It is proposed to connect the waters of the Atlantic with those of the Gulf of Mexico. There is another proposition, to connect the waters of the Chesapeake Bay with the Atlantic Ocean. A bill for that purpose was presented to the last Committee on Railroads and Canals, and was reported favorably to this House. It is proposed, also, to connect the headwaters of the Missouri River with the headwaters of the Columbia River. It is proposed to cut across the isthmus of Michigan in two places and to construct two canals.

There is another proposed, to cut across the isthmus of Michigan, involving the construction of two canals. There is also one, and larger, to give us an interior line of navigation or water way, extending from one end of the country to the other down the Atlantic coast. These are propositions which have been before the country for years, and they will be brought to the attention of this Congress. I submit, therefore, to gentlemen that they ought not to take away from that committee the only work that it has had or will probably have to do in the present Congress. If that be done, it will be followed by a proposition to impose upon the River and Harbor Committee this identical work. I say to the House, as a member of that committee in the last Congress, that it had then more work than it could do. That committee in the last House was occupied day in and day out by the subject of rivers and harbors alone, and then, even, its work was unsatisfactory to some members of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a word for the purpose of supplementing what has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky who has just taken his seat. If the House determines to add canals to the duties to be performed by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, I want to tell those interested in the improvement of the navigable waters of the country that, in my judgment, there will never be another bill passed for that purpose; for, undoubtedly, we have all seen that when attempts are made to make reasonably liberal appropriations for the improvement of your rivers and harbors they were objected to by many gentlemen as extravagant. If we add to them the canal scheme, several of which have been named by the gentleman from Kentucky, and which will involve, necessarily, the expenditure of many millions of dollars, it will simply load down that bill, and there will be no possibility of passing a river and harbor bill, no matter how important it may be to the country. So I suggest to the friends both of rivers and harbors and canals that if they desire work to be done in this direction they had better keep the two propositions separate.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit only a word or two in connection with this subject. My examination of the history of Congress in making appropriations for the construction of all canals that have been constructed by the aid of the Government of the United States since its organization leads me to a knowledge of the fact that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have made the appropriations. I wish to call the attention of my friend formerly the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to the fact that the canal right in front of his door—I think it is called the Louisville and Portland Canal—received an appropriation of $250,000 at the last session of Congress for its improvement. Now, there is the fact that every canal constructed by the United States, fifteen or twenty in number—the Saint Mary's Canal in Michigan and all the others that have been constructed under Government aid—have been constructed by appropriations made by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, whether it was called the River and Harbor Committee or the Committee on Commerce.

I have a statement here of the number of bills that have been referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses. I believe there is also a summary statement of what action was taken. It seems that in these three Congresses there were 107 bills referred to this committee, of which number 13 were reported from the committee, while 2 only of the whole number became laws. Now I ask, in behalf of our people, and I am frank to say that I have a little bit of interest in the Hennepin Canal, when we show that all of the canals have been constructed which have been aided by the Government by appropriations which came from this Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and when we find that the Committee on Railways and Canals have only acted upon 2 bills of the 107 referred to them in the last three Congresses, can we hope for any relief or remedy there? Why make a distinction; that is the question? If we do not demonstrate to the Rivers and Harbors Committee in this Congress as we did in the last that the proposition has merit, as a matter of course it will not receive the attention it did receive; and I can not see why you are going to apply one rule to the Hennepin Canal and a different rule to all the others.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of adding a a word in reference to the suggestion that all of the canals heretofore constructed with Government aid were constructed on reports of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. That was probably true. The Louisville and Portland Canal, the Sault Ste. Mary Canal on the great lakes, the Des Moines Rapids Canal, and the one on the Columbia River are instances of it. But it must be remembered that in each case it was a canal simply along the bank of a river to aid the natural navigation. There was no single one proposed for the purpose of cutting a new water way through from water course to water course. These were simply auxiliary to the improvement of the natural water ways.

Mr. MORRISON. Unless we can have a vote on the amendment I shall move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, was rejected, there being on a division 57 votes in the affirmative, negative not counted.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no relation to the clause under consideration.

Mr. BAYNE. There is no clause under consideration, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. There is. Does the gentleman desire to insert that provision in the list of committees?

Mr. BAYNE. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 38 insert as follows:
"On Amendments of the Constitution, to consist of thirteen members."

Mr. BAYNE. If that proposition should prevail——

Mr. MORRISON. Which it will not.

Mr. BAYNE. That may be; but if that proposition shall prevail I shall ask unanimous consent to place that committee on the list immediately after the Committee on the Judiciary, where its proper place would be. A committee of that character would be one of great dignity and importance and one which the experience of the members of this House will teach them it is necessary to have, if we desire to have propositions for amending the Constitution reported upon. All propositions and resolutions for amending the Constitution have been referred heretofore to the Committee on the Judiciary, and all those propositions have slept, as my friend from Iowa says, the sleep that knows no waking. The Committee on the Judiciary have never seen fit to report any of them.

There should be some amendments made to the Constitution. There should be one, in my opinion, authorizing the election by the people of their postmasters and their marshals and their district attorneys and other officers through the country.

A MEMBER. And their Senators.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes. I agree to that. Their Senators should be elected by the people.

There should be an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting special legislation. We have heard ever so much here about the Committee on Appropriations standing in the way of legislation. But I ask you how much more have your private bills stood in the way of legislation than the Committee on Appropriations? The Committee on Appropriations have had to bear the brunt of all sorts of attacks. But I say this Government is the only highly civilized government in the world whose courts are not open to its citizens, whose citizens can not go into its courts for the recovery of a right or the redress of a grievance. This Government ought to enact a constitutional amendment which will prohibit legislation by private bills, and should at the same time enact a broad law that will enable its citizens to go into its courts and have their rights and their redress. If that were done we would not have one-half of the struggle and the friction that there have been between contending bills.

In the last Congress there were introduced over 11,000 bills. I have not made a calculation how many of those were private bills, but probably there must have been 9,000 of those bills that were private in their nature. They have no place here and should not have a place here; and if we followed the progress which has been made in the States—and many of the States have set us the example—we would incorporate a provision in the Constitution which would prohibit special legislation and enable some competent committee to report some such law. You will never get it from your Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee reports very little. I hope gentlemen will see their way to the creation of such a committee as I have proposed, whose membership and whose action will be honorable and efficient in all respects.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session reported very little. They reported a great deal, and a great deal of their work died on the Calendar, as reports from other committees did. The gentleman is very anxious to have a separate committee to report on amendments to the Constitution, and complains that the Committee on the Judiciary did not report on any of the amendments which were referred to it. I will say, sir, that it was not because the Committee on the Judiciary did not consider the amendments, but because they did not consider them fit to be made as amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I know nothing in the world that the experience of members of the House will better sustain than the remark I am now going to make. If you want to have a tinkering with the Constitution of the United States create a committee especially for that purpose. I never knew a man or a committee to set up in a business that did not try to increase it. But, for God's sake, let us have no tinkering with the Constitution of the country. The Committee on the Judiciary will consider fairly, if I am on it and if the gentlemen that were there last year are on it—will consider fairly all propositions to amend the Constitution. But those amendments, which have become very frequent, which they do not consider fit to be made they will not report upon at all. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be voted down.

Mr. HAMMOND. I think the chairman of the late Judiciary Committee has made a mistake. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I only wish to say one word. I simply wish to correct a mistake the chairman of that committee seems to have made. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated he intended to put his committee immediately under the Judiciary Committee he did not intend to be sat down upon. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

39. On Manufactures, to consist of eleven members.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the clause which has just been read, and ask the House to indulge me for a moment. I had the honor to submit some amendments to the rules which went to the committee in charge of that subject.

That proposition embraced the abolition of twenty-one committees, standing and select, and the creation in their place of four new committees. One of the committees which I proposed to strike out was this Committee on Manufactures. I have been in Congress ten years and more, and I do not remember that during all this time this committee has ever done anything besides having a clerk and occupying a room assigned for its meetings, except reporting one single bill.

Now, if it is the intention of this House to create committees in order to give some gentlemen clerks, and also rooms in the Capitol in which to transact their private business, then I want to have some more committees created; and I would like to have several of the committees divided so as to distribute this luxury more generally. Take for instance the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. We have there room for three good committees. One might be a committee on coinage, with my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] as chairman, to look after the "dollar of our fathers." Then a committee on weights might be constituted for the purpose of devising a uniform system of weights throughout the country; and we might give to the Republican side of the House the chairmanship of that committee by according that position to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT]. [Laughter.] And we might fill up the committee with some of the "heavy weights" of both sides of the House. Then we might have a committee on measures. We have four Taylors in the House; and they could take our measures, if you would give them a clerk and a committee-room. It seems to be popular to have plenty of committees; and if we want a committee on manufactures we certainly want a committee on measures.

There are various other subjects to which I wish to call attention as we proceed in the consideration of this report; but at this moment I desire only to urge that the Committee on Manufactures is utterly useless, and I hope we shall vote to abolish it.

Mr. MORRISON. This report from the Committee on Rules has provided for no new committee. This committee is older than my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not say that you have provided for any new committee; but I propose to get rid of some committees for which, as we know by experience, there is no business.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report; and the proposed amendments, increasing to thirteen the membership of the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Committee on Pacific Railroads, the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River, the Committee on Education, and the Committee on Labor, were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "eleven" and insert "thirteen," so as to provide that the Committee on the Militia consist of thirteen members.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by striking out the clause providing for this Committee on the Militia. In view of the vote on my last proposition, I do not expect that this motion will receive the favor of the House. But I had hoped that the Committee on Rules, in making this revision, would recommend getting rid of some of these useless committees. The Executive which the people of this country have elected and placed at the other end of the Avenue has instituted governmental reform by dispensing with useless clerkships and in other ways stopping useless expenditures. I hope that this House will supplement the reforms of the Executive by abolishing some of these useless clerkships in the House of Representatives.

Under the rules of the last House there were sixteen clerks to committees that had no public business to transact; and twenty-one rooms of this Capitol which were assigned to committees were in fact used for the transaction of the private business of their chairmen. I supose this arrangement is to continue. It provides chairmanships for a number of gentlemen, and it furnishes them clerks and comfortable rooms for the transaction of their private business. The idea of having these numerous committees is so popular that gentlemen will hardly listen to an argument to abolish even this Committee on the Militia. I believe since I have been a member of this House that committee has never made a report on that subject.

A MEMBER. Oh, yes; it made one. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. One report my friend from Missouri states has been made in ten years. [Renewed laughter.] Well, that report, if a proper one, was never passed by the House or enacted into law.

If there is any business of the militia to transact it could go to the Committee on Military Affairs and there be better transacted. What I hope the House will do will be to get rid of some of the rubbish in these rules.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER's amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 51 strike out "eleven" and insert "thirteen;" so it will read: "On Revision of the Laws, to consist of thirteen members."

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out that committee. It was created for the purpose of preparing a codification and revision of the laws of the United States. It was created some time ago, and has accomplished the object for which it was raised, and since that time it has had no business to transact. Indeed there has been none which could properly come before it.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do remember on one occasion when my distinguished colleague from Shawneetown [Mr. TOWNSHEND] was a member of that committee, and being a new member and desiring to have something to do he introduced a bill to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes, and had it referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws. When it was referred to that committee and printed it was discovered that it related to the subject of the tariff.

Mr. MORRISON. Which of your colleagues do you refer to?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Shawneetown [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. Not my friend before me, because he was made chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and was so offended by his assignment to that committee that he never called the committee together or appointed his clerk, much to his credit.

But my colleague from Shawneetown desiring to do something, and supposing the committees of the House were created for that purpose, had a tariff bill referred to this Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which he was chairman. It exasperated the Republican side of the House, and the distinguished member from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] led the fight on that side of the House. We did not get that business away from my colleague's committee until after a struggle which lasted three days and which led to animosities which have never yet been extinguished. That committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, where it might have gone in the first place.

Now, as this committee was voted out of existence by the House, and as it never has had any business to do since I have been here, we can, I think, afford to drop it from our list.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAYNE. I move to amend by inserting before the word "revision" "amendments to the Constitution and;" so it will read: "Proposed Amendments to the Constitution and Revision of the Laws, to consist of thirteen members."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was a member of this celebrated committee during the last Congress. It met, was duly organized, and appointed a clerk, and that constituted most of its business during the session. By some hook or crook we got into our jurisdiction one little bill, introduced by a member of the committee and referred to it by the courtesy of the House. It was a bill to reduce the punishment for some offense under the internal-revenue laws. The committee, being an able-bodied committee of eleven members—and I wish to say in all seriousness, from my association with the members of that committee, it would compare favorably with the Judiciary or any other committee of this House [laughter]—labored earnestly and struggled over that amendment to the internal-revenue laws for nearly five minutes, I think, and then unanimously reported the bill to the House. In the course of time that bill was taken up and duly considered, passed, and went to the Senate, and the Senate proposed various amendments to it and sent it back. I also had the honor to be on the committee of conference on that bill. The committee met the Senate committee and duly considered the amendments. That occupied full three minutes more of our time, and we came back into the House and presented a unaminous report and the bill became a law. So it will be seen that this is not altogether a useless committee [laughter], or was not in the last Congress.

But there is another thing the committee did or tried to do. After a session of mutual admiration we concluded that we were able to grapple with some of the subjects which had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and unanimously resolved to introduce a measure in the House in the shape of an amendment to the rules giving this committee jurisdiction over some matters which had been referred to the other committee, and I believe we appointed a committee to see the members of the Committee on Rules, or who were to visit the different members of that committee—well, I suppose if they were members of the Appropriations Committee we would call them kings—we went to see the princes among the members of the House for the purpose of trying to find out if we could not get a few crumbs falling from the table of the Judiciary Committee. [Laughter.] We introduced an amendment to the rules and sent it to the committe, and that was the last we ever heard of it, for it slept the sleep we have heard so much of this evening, the sleep that knows no waking. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from New York, if he desires to proceed. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Iowa taking the floor and yielding his time to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAYNE. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his courtesy.

Mr. MORRISON. Are we to hear the other side of the debate on this amendment?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRISON. I have none.

Mr. PAYNE. Now I am coming to the other side, Mr. Speaker [laughter], and the other side is on the amendment I have proposed here. I think that this committee ought to have something to do, and I do not want the House to understand that I am trying to get this measure through for the purpose of getting on the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I resign all claim here and now for reappointment on that committee. [Laughter.] But I think there ought to be a committee that has sufficient time sufficiently well organized for the purpose of taking up and properly considering all of these proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States. There have been some propositions introduced which ought to be considered not only by the Committee on the Judiciary, but by the whole House. Take, for instance, the proposition which has been so often made to give to the Executive the power to veto any single provision contained in an appropriation bill. We have had that provision in the constitution of the State of New York for a number of years. It has manufactured considerable of timber for Democratic candidates for the Presidency, because some of our citizens have made their chief reputation through that amendment to the Constitution, and one at least has become President of the United States in consequence thereof.

I say it would be a most salutary thing to enact into a provision of the Constitution a law allowing the President to look over river and harbor appropriation bills to see whether there was in that bill some provision that needed to be stricken out before it became a law; to look over all of your appropriation bills and to cut out those provisions that are a waste of the people's money. At least this is a matter that should have the careful attention of the House; and if the Committee on the Judiciary, as I understand its former chairman to say, will properly consider all propositions for the amendment of the Constitution and agree to report none of them, I say then let us refer by this amendment of the rules to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, or some other committee which has the time to properly look into them, all matters of this character, and let it report to the House whether they are such as ought to be ingrafted upon the Constitution or whether they should be thrown aside. Let us refer them to a committee which has time to report upon these matters, whether they report favorably or unfavorably upon them.

I call for a vote on the amendment. [Applause.]

The question was taken on the adoption of Mr. PAYNE's amendment. The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 114.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are no further amendments proposed by the committee in that part of the report which relates to the list of committees, and unless there be some gentleman who desires to offer an amendment the Clerk will omit the reading of that part to save time.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I think perhaps I may have misunderstood the Speaker. Did I understand the Chair to say that if there are no further amendments the Clerk will report the next paragraph?

The SPEAKER. There are no further amendments reported by the committee. The Chair said that unless some gentleman desired to offer an amendment to some part of this clause the Clerk would omit the further reading of it to save time.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to line 79.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the Chair has neglected to put the question on my motion to strike out the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment to the text, on which a vote was taken. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the provision relating to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I now move, in line 79, to strike out the word "seven" and insert "nine;" so that it will read:

On Accounts, to consist of nine members.

Mr. MORRISON. Some members who were upon the Committee on Accounts in the last Congress inform me that that committee is greatly overworked. With the consent of the Committee on Rules I will accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois makes no objection; but it must be voted upon by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Expenditures in the State Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the War Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Navy Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Interior Department, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to consist of seven members.
On Expenditures on Public Buildings, to consist of seven members.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by striking out all of these special committees on expenditures from line 62 to line 77 and to insert in lieu thereof as follows:

On Public Expenditures, to consist of fifteen members.

I propose to strike out eight committees on expenditures and insert one committee on public expenditures, to consist of fifteen members. I have moved this amendment because I hope the House will adopt it, and as it is now so near the time of adjournment I hope the question will not be taken on this proposition until to-morrow. I will therefore yield to my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] for a motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to the adjournment at this time. I desire to suggest to gentlemen who have amendments to propose that if they will offer them this evening they will get them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume there will be no objection to that.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to gentlemen desiring to offer amendments that if they will attach their names to their amendments and send them to the Clerk's desk, so that it may be ascertained by whom they are offered, they will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to inquire whether it is understood that no amendments will be considered except those that are now sent in.

The SPEAKER. That is not the understanding. This is simply an arrangement that those who have amendments read can have them printed in the RECORD.

The following proposed amendments were sent to the Clerk's desk:

By Mr. TUCKER:

Amend Rule XI, clause 4, so that it will read:
"All bills regulating the jurisdiction of courts, practice therein, and salaries and fees of judges and officers connected therewith, to the Committee on the Judiciary."

By Mr. HENLEY:

Amend Rule XI, paragraph 49, by adding thereto the following:
"Provided further, The Public Lands Committee shall have leave to report at any time bills for the forfeiture of land grants."

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Amend Rule XI by inserting the following as clause 50:
"It shall be the duty of the committees having jurisdiction of the general appropriation bills, on or before the 1st day of March in the long and on or before the 1st day of February in the short session of Congress, to report the general appropriation bills."

By Mr. HERBERT:

Insert after section 50 of Rule XI the following:
"No reference of any bill to any committee which has not jurisdiction thereof by the previous provisions of this rule shall confer any jurisdiction on such committee, unless such reference shall have been made by a vote of the majority of the House."
After the words "contingent fund of the House," in paragraph 49 of Rule XI as proposed in the report of the majority of the committee, insert the following:
"Any commission authorized by law to report by bill to the House shall have the right to report such bill at any time for consideration, subject to the consideration of bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors."

By Mr. CASWELL:

Strike out of lines 252, 253, and 254, in Rule XXI, clause 3, the following:
"And for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

By Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois:

Add to clause 3, Rule XXI, the following words: "Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

By Mr. HOLMAN:

Amendment to the third clause of Rule XXI: "Nor shall any provision changing an existing law be in order in any such bill, except that provision for the direct reduction of the number, salary, and compensation of officers and employés of the United States shall be in order on any general appropriation bill, if germane to the subject-matter of the bill."

By Mr. SOWDEN:

1. Amend clause 10, Rule XI, by striking out the word "including."
2. Amend clause 11, Rule XI, by striking out the word "including," as also the words "and for that of the Military Academy."
3. Amend clause 12, Rule XI, by striking out the word "including."
4. Amend clause 13, Rule XI, by striking out the word "including."
5. Amend clause 15, Rule XI, by striking out the word "including."
6. Amend clause 24, Rule XI, by inserting after the word "officers," in the ninth line thereof, the following clause, namely: "And the appropriations for the different Departments of the Government not otherwise hereinbefore provided for."

By Mr. HAMMOND:

Amend Rule XI, paragraph 3, by disagreeing to the proposed amendments and then adding thereto so as to make the paragraph read as follows:
"3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government: to the Committee on Appropriations; but no general legislation shall be in order on any general appropriation bill nor as an amendment thereto; and no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditures not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

By Mr. OATES:

Amendment to Rule XI, to come in after the word "bills," in line 240, on page 11:
"The Committee on Public Lands: all bills for the disposition of any part of the public domain or pertaining to the forfeiture of land grants."
On page 12, after line 278, add as follows:
"And any such bill, the subject-matter of which has been considered and reported adversely by any committee of a former Congress, shall not be considered by either of said committees unless accompanied by an affidavit showing newly discovered evidence in support of such claim which, with the evidence upon which it was formerly considered, would prima facie entitle such claimant to relief."

Should the appropriation bills be left with the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. BLOUNT offers to amend substantially as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs shall have the same privileges in reporting and having considered bills in relation to organizing the State Department and the consular and diplomatic service as are accorded to the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means.
The Committee on Military Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the War Department or the Army.
The Committee on Naval Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the Navy Department, the Navy, and additions of vessels to the same.
The Post-Office Committee shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the Post-Office Department, the transportation of the mails, and regulating rates of postage.
The Committee on Indian Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the regulation of the Indian tribes.

By Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska:

In line 239, after the word "harbors," insert the words "the Committee on Commerce, bills for the regulation of interstate commerce."

By Mr. MURPHY:

Amend rule XI, clause 8, by adding "canals;" so that it will read: "To the improvement of rivers, harbors, and canals, to the Committee on Rivers, Harbors, and Canals."
Amend section 17 by striking out "and canals."

By Mr. GALLINGER:

Amend Rule XI, by inserting, after line 61, the following:
"On the Public Health, to consist of eleven members."

By Mr. WORTHINGTON:

Amendment to Rule XXIV:
"Members shall have the right to print remarks in the RECORD, upon any public bill or resolution, at any time after it shall have been favorably reported by a committee to the House, and before final action is taken upon it, but not thereafter."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. GORMAN members on the part of the Senate of the Joint Committee on Printing, under the provisions of section 3756 of the Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 471) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. THOMAS D. JOHNSTON, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family; and

To Mr. DINGLEY, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of 400 citizens of Wayne Township, Henry County, Indiana, for an amended pension law for soldiers of the war of 1861—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BYNUM: Papers relating to pension claim of Susan M. Conger—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of 110 citizens of Shelby County, Indiana, against the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, papers relating to the pension claims of Andrew W. Billings; of Rosanna Flahiff; of Emma Hollway; of Louisa C. Beezeley; of James Kiley, and of Susan Jones—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CATCHINGS: Papers relating to the claim of Michael Mulholland, of Mississippi, for compensation for property seized and used by the United States military authorities at Memphis, Tenn., in 1863—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Memorial of Dinnitia W. Bates, for reference of claim to Court of Claims—to the same committee.

By Mr. CRAIN: Petition for reference of the claim of the heirs of Henry Harrison, of Texas, to the Court of Claims, for correction of mistake of fact in decision of the Southern Claims Commission—to the same committee.

By Mr. DINGLEY: Memorials of 201 citizens of North Haven; of 150 citizens of Booth Bay; of 75 citizens of Southport; of 38 citizens of Monhegan; of W. S. White and 30 others, of Hurricane Isle; and of 30 citizens of New Castle, in the State of Maine, protesting against any commission looking to an arrangement for the admission of Canadian fish free of duty—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition of 54 citizens of Matinicus, Me., for protection of the fisheries—to the same committee.

Also, petition of the board of managers of the National Temperance Society, officially signed, asking for a national commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic—to the Select Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. FARQUHAR: Petition of George E. Fell, M. D., to enact bill to establish the metric system of weights and measures in Government Departments—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. LITTLE: Petition of Almon Bradford and others, for refunding of bounties in certain cases to officers and soldiers of the late war, their widows and legal representatives—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LAFFOON: Petition for the relief of Houston L. Taylor—to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. MCCOMAS: Petition for the relief of Terence and Joseph Byrne—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SPRINGER: Memorial of J. S. Allen and 108 others, citizens of Bath, Mason County, Illinois, praying Congress to authorize unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar, to issue silver certificates in denominations of one, two, and five dollars, and to apply surplus reserve to payment of the national debt—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. SOWDEN: Petition of Daniel A. Whitesell, late sergeant of Battery C, Fifth United States Artillery, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR: Petitions of John T. Dowell; of heirs of Martha O. Ward; of Henry E. Wade; of Martha W. Taylor; of Eliza B. Yandell; of Thomas Polk, guardian of heirs of Levi M. Todd, and of Edmund Taylor, executor of Howard Taylor, asking that their several claims be referred to the Court of Claims under act of March 3, 1883—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, petitions of Robert Quin; of P. L. Vernon, administrator of Robert U. Vernon; of W. F. Tipler, and of J. J. Tharp, executor of R. R. Moon—to the same committee.

By Mr. WORTHINGTON: Two petitions from Fulton County, Illinois, for pensions and half-pay for services in Black Hawk war—to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 18, 1885.

Prayer by Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from Bvt. Col. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, concerning the damage done by the storm of November 23 and 24, 1885, to the north and west sides of Governor's Island, New York Harbor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt whether the communication should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations or to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. This document relates to Governor's Island, as I understand, in the harbor of New York, which is controlled by the military. I judge that the communication should be referred in the first instance to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration, and that if an appropriation be necessary they should report it back and have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed, and, if no objection is made, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which the Chair is informed is the usual committee to consider such matters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 3663 of the Revised Statutes, a plan and estimate of the cost of protecting the roads and public buildings at Fort Canby, Wash., against the waters of Baker's Bay; which, together with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a letter, addressed to him as President of the Senate, which was evidently intended for the Senate, and the Chair will ask that it be read.

The communication was read, and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

THE NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION,
New Orleans, December 15, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The board of management of the North, Central, and South American Exposition have designated Tuesday, December 29, as American "Congressional Day," and all Senators are respectfully invited to be present upon that occasion.

The leading object of the exposition is to develop more intimate commercial and social relations between the various nations of the three Americas, and it is earnestly hoped that Senators may favor us with their presence, and thereby lend the weight of their influence to the promotion of this important work.

Very respectfully,

S. B. McCONNICO.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of residents of Jackson County, Indiana, praying that all soldiers of the late war be allowed pensions and that the limitation as to arrears of pension be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Merritt Lewis, late a private in Company K, Seventh Michigan Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRAY presented the petition of Anthony Reybold, a citizen of Delaware, praying to be reimbursed for money expended by him in raising a sunken vessel for the benefit of the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of Oliver Chamberlain, late surgeon of the Eighth Regiment Kansas Volunteers, praying the passage of a special act authorizing the Pension Office to place his name on the pension-roll at the rate of $72 per month, his present lower rating being caused by the imperfection of the act of June 16, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE presented a memorial of 105 citizens of Booth Bay, Me., protesting against any arrangement with Great Britain to admit Canadian fish free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some days ago I introduced a bill (S. 298) for the relief of captains, pilots, engineers, and mates of steam-vessels, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I now present to the Senate a brief prepared in that case explaining its provisions, and ask that that brief be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce to be considered in connection with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JULIA D. GRANT.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 580) granting a pension to Julia D. Grant, to report it favorably, without amendment. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill be first read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place the name of Julia D. Grant, widow of the late Ulysses S. Grant, deceased, on the pension-roll, and to pay her a pension during her natural life at the rate of $5,000 a year, from and after the 23d day of July, A. D. 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? If not, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not desire to object and shall not object, but I ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if an act passed a year or two ago does not extend pensions to the widows of all deceased Presidents?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I have no knowledge of any such act.

Mr. HARRIS. There was an act, the Senator knows, passed a year or two ago under which certain widows of deceased Presidents were pensioned.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. My impression was that it was a general act and extended to all widows of deceased Presidents.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; it only applied to those then widows, the cases of Mrs. Garfield, Mrs. Tyler, and Mrs. Polk. That was in conformity with what had been done by Congress in the case of Mrs. Lincoln. This bill follows the others in every respect except that Mrs. Tyler had formerly been pensioned by Congress at a lower rate, and the rate of pension in those cases was fixed to begin from the death of President Garfield. It is proposed to pension Mrs. Grant from the date of the death of her husband.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS ON IRON, STEEL, ETC.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution, which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the reports of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes made at the Watertown arsenal and transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on the 3d of December, 1884, and 11th of December, 1885, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies of each report be printed; of which 1,000 copies of each report shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the War Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. The report for 1884, it will be seen, is provided for in the resolution. The Senate passed the usual resolution on the subject a year ago, but it failed in the other House. Therefore the committee now reports in favor of the printing of the reports for both years. These are valuable reports, valuable to the scientific and industrial world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE. I introduce a bill relating to the bureaus of the Navy Department. It is a very important bill, making radical changes. It is intended to prevent abuses in that Department, and I commend it to the consideration of the Naval Committee, to which I ask that it may be referred after being twice read.

The bill (S. 672) relating to the bureaus of the Navy Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. I also introduce a bill in relation to the departments of the Army of the United States, and I commend it, as a bill of great importance, to the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which I ask that it may be referred after being twice read.

The bill (S. 673) in relation to the departments of the Army of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 674) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ellen M. Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 675) for the relief of E. B. McPherson, jr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 676) for the relief of Mrs. Catherine E. Whitall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 677) for the relief of Seth Colvin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 678) for the relief of Mary Howard Farquhar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 679) to provide for the establishment of evening schools in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 680) for the relief of the heirs of the late William A. Burt, inventor of the solar compass adopted and used by the United States Government for fifty years in making the original survey of the public domain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 681) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler, late a surgeon in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 682) granting a pension to James S. Donahue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 683) granting a pension to Henry O. Hill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 684) granting a pension to Amelia J. Gill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 685) granting a pension to Mary Marsh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 686) granting a pension to Charles N. Sebastian; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 687) granting a pension to Erik Peterson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 688) to authorize the reinstatement and retirement of Capt. T. J. Spencer as a captain of the United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 689) concerning the Capitol building and grounds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 690) for the relief of Francis Denmead; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMPTON introduced a bill (S. 691) to make it unlawful for Senators or Representatives to recommend or solicit appointments to office; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas additional legislation is necessary to carry out the intention of the tenth section of the act of Congress of the 16th January, 1883, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States;" and

Whereas the recommending or soliciting appointments to office by Senators and Representatives is not only contrary to the spirit of the said tenth section, but also interferes seriously with the performance of their legislative duties: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be a misdemeanor for any Senator or Representative of the Congress of the United States to recommend or solicit directly or indirectly the appointment of any person to an office under the Government of the United States, and that any such Senator or Representative who shall be convicted of making such recommendation or solicitation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and not less than $500, one-half of which shall go to the person or persons upon whose testimony such conviction shall have been obtained, and the other half to the United States.

SEC. 2. That whenever the appointing power shall call on a Senator or Representative for information touching an applicant for office he shall do so in writing, and such information as may be given shall be furnished in writing under the signature of such Senator or Representative, and shall be filed in the Department or bureau of the office at whose request it was furnished.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to forbid any Senator or Representative of the Congress of the United States from forwarding to the appointing power any application for office that he may receive, but any indorsement he may make thereon shall relate only to the facts of the case or the character of the applicant.

Mr. INGALLS. Who introduced that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON].

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe it is not retroactive, is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not for the Chair to state. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 692) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Ashuelot; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 693) for the relief of H. J. Simonson and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 694) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire, of Memphis, Tenn.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. With the bill I present the petition of Mrs. Lucinda McGuire, asking compensation for the use and occupation of certain houses in Memphis, Tenn., from 1863 to 1865 by the United States Army. I move that the bill and petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 695) to incorporate the Washington Central Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 696) to regulate licenses in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 697) to extend time of payment of special assessments, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 698) to prevent the unlawful inclosure of public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 699) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land-warrants lost while in the possession of the officers of the Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 700) for the relief of Madeleine Vinton Dahlgren, widow of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren, of the United States Navy, and administratrix of his estate; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (S. 701) for the relief of the legal representatives of Peter Lyle, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 702) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 703) for the relief of William G. Budlong; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 704) defining sea-service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 705) to extend letters patent granted to Charles H. Field; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 706) granting a pension to Robert Sheridan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 707) donating condemned cannon to Tower Post No. 17, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pawtucket, R. I.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 708) for the relief of Stephen N. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 709) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 710) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 711) to establish the meaning of the word "month" in the statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLQUITT introduced a bill (S. 712) for the erection of a public building at Augusta, Ga.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 713) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 16) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie M. Phelps, widow of Hon. S. L. Phelps, late minister of the United States to Peru; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the papers pertaining to the claim of C. B. Bryan & Co., of Memphis, Tenn., be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, subject to the condition imposed by the rule.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers of Nicholas J. Bigley be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Sewell Coulson, and Porter, Harrison & Fishback, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of F. Courtney Cochnower be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Dr. Delany Wiley be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Peter Lyle, deceased, be referred to the Committee on Pensions, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Maria E. Warfield be taken from the files of the Senate and sent to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of William R. Testerman be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate in the case of Jabez Burchard be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

COIN DUTIES ON IMPORTED GOODS.

Mr. BECK submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read:

Whereas the laws of the United States require that all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin; and

Whereas it is provided by section 3594 of the Revised Statutes that "The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows: First, to the payment, in coin, of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States; second, to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, direct; third, the residue to be paid into the Treasury:"

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether the laws above stated now are, or have heretofore been, obeyed; and if they have not, to report by bill, or otherwise, such measures as will secure their enforcement.

Mr. BECK. I desire the preamble and resolution to lie on the table, and I shall call them up perhaps on Monday, if it should be the pleasure of the Senate then to permit me to make some remarks in regard thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ROOMS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the rent of the building leased by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Architect of the Capitol Extension, under the resolution of the Senate of July 5, 1884, from the 1st day of April to the 15th day of November, 1885, inclusive, at the rate agreed upon in the contract, and upon vouchers properly approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Fund of the Senate.

UNPAID CLAIMS FOR MOIETIES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am requested by a reputable attorney to offer this resolution, which he says is necessary in the consideration of certain claims before Congress:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what unpaid claims are on file in the Department for moieties or shares of penalties under the internal-revenue laws, claimed to have accrued under section 179 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Statutes at Large, 305), as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Statutes at Large, 145), which was repealed by section 39 of the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Statutes at Large, 256); stating the amounts recovered in each case, the collection district in which the penalties accrued, the causes of non-payment of said claims, and the amount required to be appropriated in case said claims should be deemed just and valid.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I give notice that on Monday next I shall ask the Senate to take from the table the resolution introduced by me on the 9th instant, directing the Secretary of the Interior to communicate to the Senate a copy of each report made by the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, on which occasion it is my purpose to submit some remarks to the Senate upon the subject.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the resolution in reference to the Territory of Dakota with a view of disposing of it. I see that it has been placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the resolution in respect to the Territory of Dakota. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. If in order to do so, I will yield to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who has a matter he wishes to dispose of.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to observe that unless the Senator from South Carolina is specially and personally anxious to proceed with that debate this morning I should like very much to ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River Flats, in the District of Columbia. I am quite sure that it will take but very little longer than will be necessary for the reading of the bill and it will readily be concluded before the close of the morning hour.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the Senator from Kansas for that purpose.

POTOMAC RIVER FLATS.

Mr. INGALLS. I then ask unanimous consent that the Senate at this time consider Senate bill 335.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River Flats, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the sixth section, in line 6, by inserting after the word "than" the words:

Upon property in respect of which there is no claim adverse to the title of the United States, or—

So as to read:

That until the final decision of the matters hereinbefore in this act mentioned shall have been had, no moneys appropriated for the improvement of the Potomac River, the establishment of harbor lines in the District of Columbia, and the raising of the flats therein shall be expended otherwise than upon property in respect of which there is no claim adverse to the title of the United States, or for the improvement of navigation in the said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary calls the attention of the Chair to the sixth line of section 3, where the word "promises" as printed should be "premises." It is a typographical error.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the change be made to correspond with the sense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of the bill if there is any right of appeal reserved, or whether the decision of the supreme court of the District is to be final and conclusive?

Mr. RANSOM. By the fifth section of the bill the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is secured.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted on a former day by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. BUTLER, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate under and by what authority a so-called State Legislature has been organized in the Territory of Dakota, if such a body has been organized as alleged, and by what warrant or authority said organization has proceeded to elect Senators to this body. And that said committee inquire further and report whether said organization is not calculated to bring about a conflict of authority prejudicial to the good order of said Territory, and demoralizing to the Territorial government legally organized and administered under the authority of the National Government, and that said committee have leave to report any special matter relating to the affairs of said Territory requiring or demanding the attention of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from South Carolina has introduced this resolution. It brings to my attention a matter which entirely escaped it the other day in the proceedings of the Senate, and which I am satisfied is one deserving the immediate and earnest consideration of every member of this body. The Senate, according to its record, now stands committed to the fact that there is a State in this Union, or at least in existence as a political body, known as the State of Dakota. Speaking for myself, I had never contemplated any such assertion or admission; and when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] the other day presented a memorial coming from certain persons in that Territory, in the hurried reading of the Secretary it escaped me that it came from the official representatives of a State of which I had never heard except in the daily press.

The constitution, so called, of this State of Dakota, a copy of which I have in my hand, appointed a certain body to act for the State and to represent it. The provisions of the constitution, which will be found on page 43 of this printed copy, provide that—

Within ten days after such election the several boards of county canvassers provided by law for the canvassing of the results of elections, and the several county boards provided for by this schedule and ordinance, of their several counties, shall either or both make and certify under oath, to the president of the State executive committee a true and honest return of the total number of votes cast for the constitution and against the constitution, of the number of votes cast for and against "prohibition," &c.

* * * * * * *

The president of the State executive committee shall receive all returns of the election transmitted to him as above provided, and shall preserve the same. Within twenty days after said election the president of said State executive committee, together with such members of said committee as may assemble with him, and with the secretary of the Territory, the chief-justice of the Territory, if they will so act, and with such other officers of the Territory as he may associate with him who shall consent to act, shall canvass and compile the certificates and returns of such elections.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Missouri name the section and article to which he is referring?

Mr. VEST. I am referring to sections 19 and 20, page 43, of the so-called constitution of the State of Dakota.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Missouri please inform me what executive committee is there referred to? A committee of what?

Mr. VEST. Of the State of Dakota, so called.

Mr. HARRIS. How created?

Mr. VEST. Created by the convention which formed this so-called constitution, a body of gentlemen who have no official existence unless they get it from this convention, who came to the Senate as the representatives of a State, the State of Dakota, and who so style themselves in a memorial which we received and referred to the Committee on Territories, and thereby gave sanction to their claim, indirectly, if not directly. For one, I enter my protest against any such assumption.

The chairman of this committee is a gentleman not unknown to fame, Mr. Hugh J. Campbell, recently United States district attorney or Territorial attorney for the Territory of Dakota, a gentleman who in recent events in the State of Louisiana distinguished himself as a partisan of the Hayes administration, and who was rewarded by appointment as United States attorney for the Territory of Dakota for his zealous and not overscrupulous efforts in behalf of Mr. Hayes. This gentleman, carrying his revolutionary principles to the Territory of Dakota, now figures as the chairman of this committee. He has published an address, 5,000 copies of which have been distributed over that Territory, asserting the monstrous and revolutionary doctrine that the State of Dakota exists by virtue of the vote of the people of that Territory without reference to Congress.

Gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber are fond of talking about rebellion, they are fond of talking of treason, they are fond of talking of assserting an authority within the domain of the United States against the National Government. I want to see now whether they favor this attempt against Congress, against the Administration which the people have chosen, to set up a State government, and at the head of this movement is a man who distinctly and emphatically declares in his address to the people that this government exists without regard to Congress and by virtue of the votes that were taken without the sanction of Congress.

Mr. President, if it is not the truth, it ought to be discarded. If it is the truth, then Senators, without regard to party, should say whether this thing can be done in open day and in defiance of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Here is the memorial, which escaped my attention:

YANKTON, DAK., December 7, 1885.

To the honorable President of the Senate of the Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: We, the State executive committee of the State of Dakota, in this behalf appointed by a constitutional convention of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude, have the honor to herewith transmit to you a certified copy of the constitution of the State of Dakota and of a memorial from the constitutional convention to the President and Congress of the United States. We have also forwarded through the hands of Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON, United States Senator, an engrossed and certified copy of the constitution for presentation to the Senate through the President thereof. I am instructed on behalf of the constitutional convention of Dakota to request you to have the said memorial and constitution duly presented to the Senate of the United States for their consideration, and that the same be referred to the proper committee and acted upon as the application of said convention, for and in behalf of the people of said State, for the admission of the State into the Union.

Yours, respectfully,

HUGH J. CAMPBELL,
President State Executive Committee.
JOSEPH R. HANSON,
E. P. BEEBE,
A. J. SIMMONS,
JOHN CAIN,
JAMES A. WARE,
STEPHEN G. UPDYKE,
Committee.

These gentlemen are here in the official character of the State executive committee of the State of Dakota, and they are here in no other. They do not come here as private citizens; they come here asking recognition. I see by this morning's paper that an ovation has been extended to Mr. Hugh J. Campbell by the Legislature, so called, of the State of Dakota, for his success in obtaining recognition of Statehood at the hands of the United States Senate, and that we are now by our action in referring these papers to the Committee on Territories estopped from ever after denying that any such State exists.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not happen to know Mr. Campbell, and the Senator is giving him a great deal of gratuitous advertising; but, if he will permit me to say so, the ovation which he speaks of which has been given Mr. Campbell may serve, I think, to show that the people who gave it know Mr. Campbell better than the Senator himself does.

Mr. VEST. I care nothing for Mr. Campbell, speaking with due respect to him and his friends on this floor. Mr. Campbell is nothing to me; I never saw him; I never heard of him except in connection with the Louisiana matter, and when he appears again on the plains of Dakota. I speak of his indorsement by the constitutional convention, so called, and his official character here before the Senate, and I have a right to do that without being subjected to the criticism of my friend.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will permit me to say that I think he brought in the name of Mr. Campbell to cast odium upon him in that he had been engaged in this movement to get into the Union. In view of that remark I imputed to it what I think every other person who heard it imputed to it.

Mr. VEST. I am not responsible for the apprehensions or the deductions of the Senator from Kansas, nor am I particular about what conclusion he draws. I spoke of Mr. Campbell because Mr. Campbell appears in connection with these papers. As to gratuitous advertising, he is welcome to it if it will do him any good in his business, whatever it is, but he appears here as the chairman of this executive committee; in an address he receives an ovation for having obtained this recognition; and if these are not public events about which I, as a Senator of the United States, have a right to speak and upon which I can comment, then I had better leave this floor to my distinguished friend from Kansas. I propose to discuss Mr. Campbell so far as he comes here as the representative of this revolutionary movement, not personally, for I know nothing about him personally. He may be the purest man in all the domestic and personal relations that there is on this continent. I have nothing to do with that. I am discussing public events and public results, and I shall continue to do so notwithstanding the criticism that has been made.

This ovation is very significant from the fact that Mr. Campbell, representing this movement, and at the head and front of it, has distinctly avowed his revolutionary opinions in the address to which I have alluded. I say "revolutionary," because they are opposed to the Constitution and laws of the United States, because they set up a government that can not exist except by the will of Congress, and if there is a Senator on this floor who holds the opposite opinion I want to hear from him. I want to know if there is any Senator here representing a sovereign State who will undertake to say now that this State government can exist except by the voice and will of Congress, and whether the doctrine is now to be asserted here directly or indirectly, incidentally or otherwise, that any set of gentlemen, however respectable in their personal relations, can assemble anywhere within our public domain and create a government and put it into operation and usurp the functions of sovereignity and come here and say they are not in open and direct violation of the Constitution and laws of this Government. No talk about past events can deter me from making a legitimate argument as a lawyer and a member of this body.

I do not propose to discuss now what has happened in the past, and I shall not be induced to do it. I am now under my duty as a Senator discussing passing events of the most pressing importance, and I thank the Senator from South Carolina for this resolution, because I believe that the deliberate and calm and earnest attention and action of this body will now prevent trouble. I have no doubt from the papers before me, as I shall attempt to show the Senate, that the intent of these men in Dakota is, if Congress shall adjourn without admitting this State, that they will go on in defiance of the will of Congress to operate a State government. I assert here as a lawyer that the organization of any State government without the consent of Congress directly given is revolutionary. The Supreme Court of the United States and this body have over and over again declared that to be so.

Now let us see what is the opinion of Mr. Campbell at the head of his committee—not his individual opinion but his official declaration as chairman of this State executive committee of the so-called State of Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator be good enough to announce to the Senate the document from which he reads and the page of it, so that we may follow him?

Mr. VEST. I read an extract from an address issued by Mr. Campbell over his own signature to the people of Dakota.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the document?

Mr. VEST. This is an argument by Judge P. C. Shannon.

Mr. HARRISON. I have it in my hand. If the Senator will refer to the pages I shall be able to follow him.

Mr. VEST. The fourth page.

The doctrine of the pamphlet is, that the people south of that line—

The forty-sixth degree of latitude—

by virtue of their population, their territory, their constitutional rights, and the inviolable guarantees of treaties, and the will of the people, are a State, and ought, without further delay, to form a State constitution and a State government.

But if it be said that that is not an authoritative and official declaration of the purpose of these parties, I go now to an official address issued by this State executive committee to the people of Dakota under the sanction and by direction of the so-called constitutional convention, an address signed by Mr. Campbell, the chairman, and to which I call the attention of the Senate to show that every syllable of what I have charged is the absolute truth. Mr. Campbell says in this address issued under the sanction and direction of the constitutional convention:

We speak advisedly when we say to you that in all directions the sentiment in favor of the admission of this part of Dakota—

The Senator from Indiana will find this on the third page of the address to the people of Dakota, with the constitution of the State of Dakota adopted by the constitutional convention—

We speak advisedly when we say to you that in all directions the sentiment in favor of the admission of this part of Dakota as a State into the Union has grown stronger each year, until the demand from the people of the United States that this act of justice shall be done is now almost universal.

Almost all the great newspapers of the land, East as well as West, and even in California, are demanding that Congress shall admit Dakota.

We do not believe that the party now in power can afford to antagonize the sentiment of justice on the part of the American people which is thus voiced by the press. We do not believe that the present national Administration will have the disposition so to do.

[One thing is sure, if the two hundred and fifty thousand people of Dakota, by a full vote at the polls this coming November, adopt this constitution and elect such men as will represent their wishes, and if the people of the new State, after electing them, with the temper and firmness of American citizens, stand upon their rights under the Constitution of the United States and support their State government—

Mark that language—

"stand upon their rights under the Constitution of the United States and support their State government," the people of the United States will respect their attitude and will join with them in demanding their immediate admission. And one of two results will surely follow: either the immediate admission of the State of Dakota by the next Congress at its first session or the hurling from power of the Congress that thus abuses its power and defies the public sentiment of the country. It is time that Congress ceases to trifle with the rights and interests of two hundred and fifty thousand citizens of the United States.

We believe that your admission into the Union is a matter to be determined by you by your votes at this election. If a full vote is polled and your constitution is adopted and your State government is elected, no Congress and no administration will dare to so far defy public opinion as to deny your admission.

But to remove any doubt about the meaning of this committee, let us read further:

The ordinance of 1787 and the treaty with France, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, contained irrevocable guarantees to the people of this Territory of the right to form a State Government for themselves and be admitted into the Union as soon as their population and resources are sufficient for self-government. The ordinance of 1787 has been extended by Congressional enactment over Dakota by four successive statutes. The rights guaranteed by that ordinance are matters of compact, which compact is stipulated in the ordinance to be forever irrevocable without the consent of the people of the Territory. The ablest lawyers and jurists of the country have united in declaring that the people of this Territory are parties to those compacts, and of right entitled to act upon them and demand their fulfillment. In addition to these compacts, the Constitution of the United States, as judicially interpreted by the Supreme Court, which interpretation has never been reversed by any subsequent court, has guaranteed to the people of this Territory, as of all Territories, the absolute right of self-government and Statehood whenever their condition, their population, their area, and their resources are sufficient to enable them to govern themselves.

These are constitutional and legal rights which Congress has no lawful power to set aside, and can only disregard, as Senator HARRISON stated upon the floor of the Senate last winter, by "brute force."

Did the Senator from Indiana ever express upon this floor that these people or the people of any other Territory had the right to admission without the action and consent of Congress? Does the Senator say now or intimate that the language of this pamphlet is true that these people have that right, without regard to the action of either House of Congress or both collectively? I assert that the Senator from Indiana will not stand upon this floor and say that any State can so exist inside or outside this Union——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not need to state anything on that subject on his own authority, if he heard my words yesterday; and I say to him now that I hold, and have always held, to the doctrine that a State can neither break into nor break out of this Union.

Mr. VEST. Very good. We are not talking about breaking out. That question is res adjudicata, and nobody is asking now to reopen it. I am talking now about the transaction that is immediately pressing on the Senate. This question is one not of breaking into or breaking out of the Union, but breaking into Statehood without the consent of Congress. That is the proposition. I say that the Senate of the United States and the Supreme Court of the United States have declared in unmistakable tones over and over again that this can not be done. I know, as the Senator said yesterday, that there are precedents of States being admitted without enabling acts. When Tennessee was admitted she came to the Senate with two Senators elected and with a constitution creating a complete State government, but it was done under peculiar circumstances, because Tennessee claimed that by virtue of the cession of her territory made by North Carolina to the Union she was entitled——

Mr. HARRISON. But, Mr. President, she did not pass immediately from the jurisdiction of the State the Senator has referred to. She passed into a Territorial condition under United States law before she became a State.

Mr. VEST. That does not touch the point I was making on that subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Then there could have been no point in it.

Mr. VEST. Well, I am not leaving that to the Senator. Heaven help me if he is to decide this argument. I am now appealing to this body and to the Senators here who have taken no such part in this debate or in this question as to be prejudiced one way or the other. It matters not whether it was a Territory immediately or not. The point I make is that Tennessee claimed the right to organize a State government because under the terms of the original cession of the Territory of Tennessee by North Carolina to the Federal Union the provision was placed in that cession that it should be immediately organized into a State. That was the claim, that was the condition, and upon that Tennessee claimed the right of Statehood.

California was also admitted into the Union without an enabling act, and Michigan was admitted; but the history of the Michigan case, which has been appealed to time and again as a precedent for the actions of this so-called constitutional convention in Dakota, shows that Michigan was finally admitted upon the compromise of a question of boundary which almost resulted in civil war in 1836 between Ohio and Michigan. The proceedings of the Senate of the United States at that time develop the fact that the very question which is now pending in the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina before this body came up in regard to Michigan.

A young gentleman of revolutionary proclivities, of considerable talent, a daring—I will not say an adventurer, but a daring statesman was appointed when twenty years old to be Secretary of the Territory of Michigan, a Mr. Mason, descended from the Virginia Masons. He originated the idea in his young and boyish ambition of organizing a State government and pressing that government upon the Congress of the United States. He became the acting governor of the Territory in Jackson's administration, and he issued the celebrated proclamation that if Ohio undertook to drive one solitary stake into the soil of Michigan he would call out the militia of the Territory and make war upon her. We all recollect, who have given any attention to the matter, that General Jackson appointed two commissioners to visit the scene of hostilities, Mr. Rush and Mr. Howard, and these commissioners succeeded in allaying the intense excitement for a time. Michigan applied for admission under a State constitution, and with this Mr. Mason elected as governor; and the debates of the Senate show that the memorial presented was exactly like this memorial, and purported to come from the State of Michigan. Mr. William Hendricks of Indiana, the uncle of the late Vice-President, moved in the Senate a resolution which declared "in receiving this memorial"——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator give me the page again?

Mr. VEST. If the Senator wishes the exact language I will turn to it with pleasure. It is on page 26 of the pamphlet I have referred to.

That this paper shall be considered in no other light than as a memorial coming from individual citizens of Michigan.

It was presented, as this memorial here was presented, coming or purporting to come from a State; and the Senate of the United States after debate in which Mr. Webster, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clay, Mr. Benton, Mr. Buchanan, the greatest statesmen of that era, participated for days, and finally on a deliberate vote adopted the motion of Mr. Hendricks, and declared that this State of Michigan, so called, could have no legal or constitutional existence except by the will of Congress; and to-day that question is presented here.

This memorial has been received and referred to a committee coming from a so-called "State executive committee" when no such State exists under the Constitution or laws of the United States. Why, Mr. President, if it be a State, if what they have done is justified by law and the Constitution, why do they ask for admission into the Union? The Constitution of the United States provides that the highest act of sovereignty on the part of a State shall be the election of two Senators, and yet these gentlemen meet upon the plains of Dakota at Sioux Falls or Huron, elect two gentlemen as Senators, two gentlemen from the State of Indiana—Mr. Moody, whose celebrated opinion declaring the Yankton bonds to be unconstitutional and illegal, we have heard, and Mr. Edgerton, who, I believe, held a seat in this body since I have been a member from the State of Minnesota, but both originally from the State of Indiana. These gentlemen are the elected Senators and are coming to this body claiming to represent the sovereignty of a State, and this "State executive committee," representing the same sovereignty, puts this memorial before us!

Mr. President, I say the Supreme Court of the United States have decided emphatically and distinctly that these proceedings are illegal, revolutionary, and void. I quote from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States found on page 37 of the pamphlet to which I have alluded for convenience, although the printed reports of the Supreme Court contain the same. Mr. Justice McLean said in a case that went up from Michigan testing the constitutionality of what was known as the Mason State constitution:

Now the conflict of power, in the case under consideration, is clear and distinct.

That was a case in which the so-called State Legislature under the so-called constitution had incorporated or given a charter to what was known as the Young Men's Society in the State of Michigan, and the question was as to the legality of that act. The supreme court of the so-called State of Michigan, appointed by the so-called governor, Mr. Mason, decided the act to be constitutional, because if they had decided it unconstitutional they would have judicially cut their own throats, as that supreme court simply had its existence and being by virtue of the same authority which created this society; and no court composed of mortal men has ever yet been found that was capable of committing political or judicial suicide. Therefore they decided that this act was entirely constitutional, and that the State government had a legal existence. The case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I read now an extract from their opinion. Justice McLean said:

Now the conflict of power in the case under consideration is clear and distinct. The two sovereignties of the State and the Territorial government can not exist at the same time within the same limits. The Territorial government exists in full vigor until it is abolished by the admission of the State. There was, then, a direct and irreconcilable repugnance in the exercise of the sovereign power by the State so long as the Federal authority was exercised in the Territory.

Now, sir, we have the anomaly presented by the Senator from Indiana of a Delegate in the other branch of Congress representing the Territory of Dakota and two Senators representing the sovereignty of the State of Dakota knocking for admission at our doors. It is impossible, say the Supreme Court, that these two forms of government should exist on the same soil; one must give place to the other; and I could stand here until my strength was exhausted and produce to the Senate a pile of decisions from courts from the State of Ohio, from the State of Minnesota, from the highest judicial authority in the State of Michigan, Judge Cooley, who in the fourth edition of his work on Constitutional Limitations declares that an enabling act is the only safe and constitutional method in order to enable a Territory to come into the Union as a State; and I declare here that no matter what may have been done in the case of other States under political pressure or excitement or necessity, the Congress of the United States can alone give Statehood, and the proper way in which it is given is through an enabling act, and the Senate so determined during its last session.

Mr. President, look at the condition of this matter. The Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, prepared a bill entitled "An act to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes"—a carefully-prepared piece of legislation, distinct and emphatic, and passed by this body by a large majority. I was a member of the Committee on Territories when this bill was prepared. It was then thought necessary by the Senator from Indiana that this enabling act should go into effect in order to enable this Territory to become a State and to be admitted as a member of the Union. This bill passed the Senate and went to the House of Representatives, but the House failed to act upon it, and then these gentlemen in Dakota, not willing to await the action of Congress, come together for the second time—because this is the second time they have attempted to organize a State—meet together at Sioux Falls in a so-called convention, adopt a constitution with powers in the Legislature equal to those of any other State Legislature in this Union, elect a governor and lieutenant-governor, all the officers of State, members of the House of Representatives, two Senators, and proclaim to the world that the State of Dakota has come into existence notwithstanding the failure on the part of Congress to pass an enabling act to enable it to do so.

Mr. President, in these assertions of sovereignty against the United States, what can be more flagrant, what can be more outrageous? We are told here it makes no difference whether you pass an enabling act or not, if the people say in so many words, "We have a constitution, we have a State government under the will of the people, and all that is necessary is the presence of 250,000 freemen of Dakota to assert in thunder tones that they have made a State to enforce that mandate upon Congress."

A serious question has been presented here. For years there has been great conflict of opinion in that Territory as to the division of the Territory. A large portion of the people have urged that the Territory should be divided from east to west, and others from north to south. This convention took that question out of the hands of Congress and settled it themselves. They do not consult the people of Northern Dakota. For all practical purposes they disfranchise them; they ignore the action of the last Congress, in which it was proposed to pass an enabling act for Southern Dakota under the name of the State of Dakota, and to organize a Territorial government in the northern part of it to be called the Territory of Lincoln; they take the whole thing into their own hands and pass upon the question of dividing the Territory, and then say to the world, "We defy the action of Congress, because we have spoken and our voice is supreme."

Mr. President, if this can be done, what becomes of many adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States, one made as late as the last term in the Murphy case, that the Congress of the United States has absolute authority over the Territories to do with them as it pleases; that it can legislate directly for the Territories; that it can annul any act of a Territorial Legislature; that under the constitutional provision that Congress shall make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States they have the absolute, unquestioned, and sole right, if they choose to exercise it, of making any law they please, and that no State can exist there except by the will and by the enactment of Congress? If this can be done we have a state of anarchy and are outside of all constitutional limitations. I say that it is a very grave question and involving consequences of the most serious kind in the subsequent history of this country. If this can be done, if this be the law, then the Constitution of the country which declares that no authority except that of a State can send Senators to this body amounts to nothing; the decisions of the Supreme Court, which declare that we are to decide when a State shall come into existence, are simply waste paper, nonsense, simply sound and fury, signifying nothing. I shall offer to the Senate the following resolution——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri offer an additional resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. Let it be read for information. I suppose it is offered only for that purpose, as there is another resolution before the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I understand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial from certain persons calling themselves the State executive committee of the State of Dakota, and referred to the Committee on Territories, shall be considered in no other light than as a memorial coming from individual citizens of the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the resolution be printed and go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it introduced as an independent resolution?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; independent entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received and printed and laid over.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, when Michigan elected two Senators in the very same way that Dakota has done here, and sent them to this body, and sent Representatives to the House of Representatives, they were not admitted into either body. Neither body undertook to say, although party spirit then ran as high as it does to-day and even higher, that they were entitled to seats on either floor in their official capacity. The proceedings of the Senate, which I have examined, show that these two gentlemen were admitted as spectators upon the floor of the Senate, and the gentlemen elected as Representatives were admitted by the House of Representatives to the floor of the House, but not one lawyer could be found who asserted the right on the part of the Territory of Michigan to organize that State government and give it the power of a State propria vigore. If it can be done in one instance it can be done in any, and the debates which were then had in regard to Michigan, extracts of which I have before me, show by an unbroken current of declaration that both parties on this floor united in the position which I maintain. For that reason I offer this resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry of him at this point?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know of any one who claims that these men have a right to seats as Senators on this floor; I have never heard any such proposition; but I desire to ask the Senator in reference to the State of Colorado. Does he not remember that two men were elected by a Legislature purporting to be the Legislature of Colorado, and who were admitted here on the floor as spectators you may call them, and were here for two years, and that a bill passed Congress twice admitting that State into the Union, these Senators presenting themselves to be sworn in if the State was admitted, but the bill was vetoed by President Johnson? The State was afterward admitted under a law of Congress, because the President at that time persisted in vetoing the bill. Does he not know that no Senator on either side pretended that that was a revolutionary proceeding merely because they claimed that they ought to be admitted? I did not hear any one talk about it as a revolutionary proceeding.

Mr. VEST. If the so-called State of Colorado had done as these men have done in Dakota, organized a State government, elected their officers, proclaimed it a State, issued an address to the people declaring it to be a State without reference to the action of Congress, I do not care what was done in the case of Colorado it was revolutionary if these facts existed. What is revolution? It is subverting the constitutional government of a country; it is asserting a jurisdiction and authority in any portion of the public domain antagonistic to the constitutional authority. What is the constitutional authority in regard to the Territories? The people of the United States by a written Constitution have given the right and the sole right to Congress to organize a State—I assert that proposition—to organize a State. If these gentlemen see proper to hold a barbecue or a picnic and pass resolutions that they are a State, that amounts to nothing.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to enter into this discussion, for I am not on the committee, but I should like the proposition fairly stated. Does any one in the Senate claim that Dakota is now a State? Do that people claim so themselves? By virtue of the very constitution they present to the Senate they do not claim that they are a State until it is agreed to by Congress. Because they use the term "State," does that make them revolutionists against the Government, when they come to Congress and ask to be admitted as any other State has been heretofore? Is that a revolutionary proceeding? Is it not the right of the citizens of this country to petition Congress? Congress need not admit them, but certainly it is not a revolution against this Government merely for them to come as citizens and present their claim to the country asking that Congress shall pass upon their rights when they provide in the very constitution they submit that they are not a State until their Statehood is acknowledged by this Government. I do not think it is fair to treat them in that way, nor to try and arouse the country to the belief that there is a rebellion going on against this Government when there is no such intention.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Missouri will allow me a moment. As I offered the resolution I think it perhaps proper to say that I have not claimed or insisted that this action has gone itself to the extent of revolution. I maintain and I think my friend from Missouri maintains that the tendency is toward revolutionary proceedings, that it threatens to bring about a conflict between the constitutional authority and an organization which has no legal existence. That is the point I make, and that was the object in offering the resolution. The Senator from Illinois is familiar with the history of the application of Michigan for admission into the Union, and he must recall that similar action in that Territory, as my friend from Missouri suggested, came very near bringing on a bloody conflict with the people of Ohio and also of Indiana; and that is exactly what I desire to prevent here by anticipation.

Mr. LOGAN. In response to the Senator from South Carolina I desire to say that I am not in any way suggesting what idea the resolution may anticipate in the future or what the results may be; but until the people of this Territory set themselves up as a State organization and undertake to act as a State exercising the functions of a State government you can not charge them with revolution, no matter what they may call themselves. Terms are easily used. The fact that I may call myself by one name or another does not make it true. The fact that they in their petition call it a State does not make it a State, and until they undertake to exercise the powers of Statehood they are in no wise in violation of the Constitution or revolutionists against it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment with the consent of my friend from Missouri?

Mr. VEST. I would rather go on.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to put one question, and that is whether any other organization than that of a State can elect United States Senators? Is not that exercising the functions of Statehood? Is not the provision for the collection of taxes, and is not the provision for courts, exercising the functions of Statehood? If not, then I have misapprehended what constitutes a commonwealth.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the Senator's question. The election of Senators from a Territory does not make them Senators.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. They must come from a State.

Mr. LOGAN. They make a proposition to Congress. If Congress accepts it, then they become Senators, but not until then. Territory after Territory has elected Senators and sent them here in advance of admission as a State, for what purpose? For the purpose of presenting the claims of the people before the Congress of the United States, that their claims may be passed upon, and for no other purpose. If the Senate then says they are not Senators, they are not. They must be admitted; it must be a State before they can be admitted, as has been done heretofore in divers and sundry instances.

Mr. BUTLER. There is but one instance that I remember.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to correct the Senator's recollection of history; but it has been done, and at the time it was done no one here or elsewhere thought that there was an act of revolution against this Government, but the notion was that they were acting as persons appearing on the part of the Territory, presenting as petitioners their claim to the Government of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, I prefer to let these people speak for themselves. Though I listen with much pleasure always to the Senator from Illinois, yet I take it that their written words and their official acts are worth more in this argument than his declarations as to what they mean; and permit me to say to the Senator, speaking as to historical events, there never was but one case parallel with that of Dakota, and that was the case of the Territory of Michigan.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me to correct him, I think the case of Minnesota is somewhat parallel to the present application of Dakota for admission.

Mr. VEST. I dislike exceedingly to correct a Senator as to the history of his own State, but I have recently read it. Minnesota had an enabling act.

Mr. INGALLS. Kansas had not.

Mr. VEST. I do not know how Kansas came into the Union. She got in, broke in, somehow or other.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri will permit me to correct him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The State of Minnesota it is true had an enabling act to form a State government, and under it a constitutional convention was called. That body divided, and in fact there were two conventions held, and throughout the entire session they remained apart until at the close of the action of the conventions they came together and adopted a constitution. Under that constitution, before action by Congress, in the fall before Congress met, a State ticket was elected from the governor down to the lowest State officer, and of those officers—I happened to be one of the district judges elected—Governor Sibley was elected governor of the State; a whole State ticket was elected and remained so, while the Territorial organization was still in existence, Governor Medary, of Ohio, being the Territorial governor.

The State officers continued in office after being elected. The State was not admitted until the next spring, in May. Hon. Henry M. Rice and General James Shields were elected United States Senators for the State during the winter, and they were admitted in May when the State was admitted.

Mr. LOGAN. They were elected before the State was admitted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir; and if the Senator from Missouri will refer to the debates in the Congress of the United States he will find the position taken by Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, expressed in the strongest terms favoring the admission of the Senators elected prior to the admission of the State. The State was admitted under all those circumstances and the members of Congress elected in advance received in the House. We had elected three members of Congress, believing we were entitled to three. One of those was rejected on account of there not being sufficient population, and two were admitted to their seats, and the Senators were admitted at the same time to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I should like to call his attention to another case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Missouri thinks there is no case except that of Michigan which is on a parallel with this case of Dakota. I want to call his attention to the case of the admission of the State of Kansas. He professed some lack of knowledge of how Kansas got in. A few vacancies occurred about that time and we wanted a State or two to make up the quorum in the general list of States, and so Kansas got in. It was admitted on the 29th day of January, 1861. On the very next day, the 30th of January, as the debate in the Globe before me discloses, the following occurred in the House of Representatives:

> Mr. GROW. The member from the State of Kansas is present and ready to be sworn in.
> Martin F. Conway, Representative from the State of Kansas, then appeared and took the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Conway had been here waiting on the proceedings of Congress for the admission of the State under the Wyandotte constitution for several months, and he served out the remainder of the term for which he had been elected; that is, the residue of the two years' term. He had been elected at the time of holding the regular election for members of Congress in the States of the Union. The question was discussed in this body also, and among the persons who discussed it very fully was one of the Senator's predecessors in this body, Mr. Green, of the State of Missouri, and as a general thing the Missourians about that time knew pretty well what was going on in Kansas, and if there was any chance to find a joint in the Kansas harness they found it. Mr. Green was a man who was quick of wit, I have been told, and I think the State of Missouri regards him now as one of the ablest men that ever held a seat on this floor from that State.

Mr. HARRISON. There has been a succession in that line.

Mr. VEST. What is that?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Kansas said that Senator Green of Missouri was distinguished for his wit. I say that succession has been kept up.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Missouri spoke of the fact that part of the Territory of Dakota had been carved out, and the Senator from South Carolina commented on that fact as an evidence of the revolutionary character of these proceedings. When the constitutional convention of the State of Kansas came to fix the boundaries of that State, the new free State of Kansas, they took about two-thirds of the Territory of Kansas. Instead of taking the entire Territory extending as it did from the Missouri River to the crest of the Rocky Mountains, they took the first four hundred miles of the east portion of that Territory and named that part in the constitution as the State of Kansas in case it should be admitted.

Mr. Green, one of the Senators from Missouri, proposed to amend by making the larger boundary, and he made reference to what the Senator quoted from H. J. Campbell as to the Louisiana treaty and the right to demand admission on account of the terms of that treaty. Mr. Green said:

> Mr. GREEN. I have but one word to say in reply. It is true, under the Louisiana treaty there was a stipulation that they should be admitted as States—and I pressed this upon the attention of Congress two years ago—but the time was never named. The circumstances under which they were to be admitted depend upon the sound discretion of Congress. It is also true that the Senator from Illinois takes an improper position when he says the people of Kansas are satisfied with these boundaries, and that he is willing to put in a portion of Nebraska if the people of Nebraska are so. Why, sir, when these Territories were organized there was a special provision put into the Territorial bill reserving the right to change the boundaries as we pleased.

I speak of that to show that the question of the boundaries of the proposed State of Kansas were different from those of the Territory of Kansas, and that fact was specially referred to in the Senate; and yet that State was received in that turbulent time, when there was revolution cropping up around us; so he need not go far away off for a parallel case. No one then suggested that the people of Kansas had adopted a revolutionary proceeding by reason of the fact that they had changed their boundaries, but it was freely conceded that they had a right to do it, and no one suggested that because they had (as they did at the time they adopted the constitution) elected a governor, lieutenant-governor, and every State officer, including district judges and supreme court judges, as Minnesota had done, they put themselves in a position of revolution to the General Government, nor that that followed because they had elected a member of Congress who was here waiting, cooling his heels in the anteroom of the House of Representatives, waiting for Congress to admit that State into the Union and ready to take his seat, as he did the very next day. Neither was that suggested as an evidence of the fact that the people of Kansas were in a state of revolution; and it presents, as I think, a perfectly parallel case to that of the citizens of Dakota who are now asking admission here as a State by reason of the fact that they have agreed on certain boundaries and adopted a constitution to govern that particular territory.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, I confess frankly that I really did not know how Kansas was admitted into the Union. I made an examination as to the respective States that have been admitted from a Territorial condition, and I did not find any act of Congress for the admission of the State of Kansas. I say this with due deference to the statement of my friend from Kansas that the Missourians were and are very cognizant of the affairs of the State of Kansas. That is very natural. A large portion of our personal property found its way into that State and needed looking after from time to time; but let that be as it may, we have had no undue solicitude in regard to the affairs of Kansas, but only a friendly interest in her welfare.

Now the Senator from Illinois says that revolution has never been charged as to the admission of these other States which have organized a State government and come here with elected Senators. No Territory in this Union ever before came to Congress with such a declaration as we find from the State executive committee of the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. Why, Mr. President, has the Senator in mind the declaration of the State of Tennessee which I read yesterday?

Mr. VEST. The people of Tennessee, I undertake to say, never openly declared that they could exist as a State without any action on the part of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I read yesterday from Hough's American Constitutions the message sent to the Senate and House of Representatives by the State organization that had been formed there, and it contained a notification that on a particular day named the Territorial government would cease and the State government would assume its powers.

Mr. VEST. I understand that they did, but at the same time it was stated in the debates in Congress and by the representatives of the State of Tennessee that they made profert and offer of that constitution for the action of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Is not that done here?

Mr. VEST. They thought they would be admitted as a State before a certain day, and they undertook to hurry up the action of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator if that profert is not made here in the constitution of the proposed State of Dakota, accompanied by a respectful memorial, and whether the last clause of the constitution adopted there does not expressly stay the hands of her State officers until Congress acts.

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. President, the Senator has anticipated my argument. Here is the declaration with which these persons come to Congress; I have read it before, and I will read it now in answer to the Senator from Illinois particularly. They do not come here and make a respectful profert of a constitution. They do not come and say, "Here is our constitution; we ask you to recognize us as a State." The whole issue in this case is, Does the power to make a State rest in Congress, or does it rest in a collection of individuals in a Territory? That is the whole of it, and we are bound to take one side or the other. I assert that this address declares that the State exists by virtue of their action and irrespective of any action had by Congress in the matter at all; either that or the English language has lost all significance.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? He is not reading from the memorial addressed to Congress at all; he is reading from an address issued by this State executive committee to the people of Dakota.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Not from the memorial. I have the memorial if he wants to hear it.

Mr. VEST. I am reading an authoritative and official declaration, if such terms can be used in connection with this proceeding, from the recognized and organized State executive committee created by the convention that made this constitution.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be true, but the Senator said he was talking of the attitude in which they addressed themselves to Congress. Their memorial to Congress is not what he is reading.

Mr. VEST. With all due deference to the Senator that is an evasion of the whole argument. These men have put before the world their status in this case. They have set forth and crystallized in the form of an address to their own people their rights and their claims, and what are they? This is a public document, it is an official document. Is it necessary to thrust it on the desk of the Secretary of the Senate in order that we may take cognizance of it? It comes from that convention, it comes from the only authority they recognize so far as Statehood is concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator need not attempt to put me in the position of evading anything; I have not that habit in debate. I simply corrected the Senator as to his description of the document, but he is entirely welcome to all he can get out of that as an official document.

Mr. VEST. I shall use it without any permission. What is the language of this address put before the people of Dakota, and which they accept as the voice of that convention and which is their platform, so to speak, in all this matter? They claim that they have the right to admission into the Union whenever in their judgment they have sufficient population and resources to entitle them to become a State. These are constitutional and legal rights, they say, growing out of the ordinance of 1787. I do not care what Mr. Green said about it or about the Louisiana purchase; I say the Supreme Court of the United States decided that, irrespective of the ordinance of 1787 or the purchase from Napoleon of the Louisiana territory, under the Constitution of the United States Congress and Congress alone can create a State or admit it into the Union. Congress can repeal any treaty; Congress can tear up any stipulation or condition in any cession of territory, and the very day that it becomes our territory the impress and stamp of the Constitution of the United States is put upon it and it is subject to such rules and regulations as Congress may make. Yet these men assert here and proclaim it officially—

> These are constitutional and legal rights which Congress has no legal power to set aside and can only disregard, as Senator HARRISON stated upon the floor of the Senate last winter, by brute force.

That is, outside of the law, outside of the Constitution, like a set of ruffians and brigands we can take them by the throat, but if we do it, we do an illegal, an unconstitutional, and disgraceful act. I deny it. The power exists in Congress and Congress alone, and I say this proceeding is revolutionary. It can be nothing else, for it is outside of the decisions of the Supreme Court and the decisions of the Senate.

But I come now to the provision alluded to yesterday by the Senator from Indiana and to-day by the Senator from Illinois, which they say is the salve of this whole matter. This is St. Jacob's Oil, that takes away all pain. Look at it.

After they had organized a State government, elected their officers, provided for taxation, provided for schools, provided to restrict corporations, done everything that is done under the State constitutions, as they say, of Pennsylvania and of Illinois, now here is the only solitary thing that looks toward any limitation of the powers of that State Legislature:

> SEC. 32. Nothing in this constitution or schedule contained shall be construed to authorize the Legislature to exercise any powers except such as are necessary to its organization to elect United States Senators, to provide and pass means and measures necessary preliminary and incident to admission to the Union and to assemble and reassemble and adjourn from time to time; neither to authorize any officer of the executive or administrative departments to exercise any powers of his office except such as may be preliminary and incident to admission to the Union; nor to authorize any officer of the judiciary department to exercise any of the duties of his office until the State of Dakota shall have been regularly admitted into the Union, except such as may be authorized by the Congress of the United States.

What is this but a declaration of sovereignty, with a limitation on the powers of the Legislature? Here they exercise and provide for exercising the highest attribute of sovereignty known to the Constitution of the United States, and that is the election of two Senators to represent a State. But more than that, they provide that means may be provided by the Legislature to secure the admission of the State. What means? I take it money appropriated to pay the expenses of the State executive committee, with Campbell at his head, to come here and secure this Statehood for the people of Dakota. The judges are not to act, but they are still judges. The governor is not to act as governor, but still he sanctions certain measures that are necessary to secure admission into the Union. It is a State outside the Union. Can such a thing exist under our Constitution? What Senator here, even under the plea of the mad necessity of party, can assert such a principle as that? Why is it a State?

The Senator from Illinois says it is a proposition. Is this a proposition? That Legislature is now in session. It adjourns from day to day. Its receives its minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to the Congress of the United States as if he came from Austria or Germany. Mr. Campbell is received with plaudits from the galleries, loaded with bouquets, and receives the thanks of the Legislature of the State of Dakota for his extraordinary success in obtaining recognition at the hands of the Senate of this State executive committee of a State that exists only in the imagination of these gentlemen at Sioux Falls.

I suppose, as a matter of course, what I may say avails nothing so far as actual results are concerned. I do not accuse my friends on the other side with wanting three more electoral votes. Oh, no; I do not ascribe to them any partisan feeling in this matter, although I have been placarded and blackguarded through all the press of that interesting and growing community called Dakota for having exercised my constitutional privilege in objecting to their Statehood, because I made objection to the admission of two States out of that Territory into the Union. The Rocky Mountain Banner of Freedom, the Prairie Courier, and the Yankton Almanac have lived almost for the last two years by attacking me, but I still survive and am able to make a "few feeble remarks" in the same direction which tempted my first effort.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. He has said a great deal about this State being out of the Union. That I can understand; that I have heard something about before; but when he talks about our getting three electoral votes by reason of it I do not understand him. How are we going to get three electoral votes in the electoral college of the United States from a State outside of the Union?

Mr. VEST. I have seen many strange things. I do not know whether these people will undertake to give electoral votes in the next election or not. If they do, it will be about on a par with what they have done. They would have as much right to go to the electoral college and cast three votes as they have had to organize a State government. I want them to pass through the ordeal other States have, the discriminating judgment of Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. They have done that, and you have voted it down twice.

Mr. VEST. I do not blame my friend from Illinois for his zeal in this matter. If I were disposed to be ill-natured I might say that he and the Senator from Indiana anticipated that these votes might become very essential in the future.

Now, the Senator says we voted down the proposition. We have never voted it down.

Mr. LOGAN. I know what has been done.

Mr. VEST. These people have never come here and proposed to bring in a State of Dakota composed of the whole Territory. They divided the Territory themselves without our consent, and when we undertake to show that it ought not be divided and that the population is not sufficient for any such scheme as this, then those of us who oppose it are told that we are partisans actuated by a desire to deprive these people of their equal and constitutional rights in the Union!

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator refers to me in what he says about partisans I think he makes a mistake. He was the Senator who insinuated that persons might desire to get States in for the purpose of getting electoral votes. He ought not to insinuate that and then try to cast an aspersion on others that they were acting from partisan motives. I said nothing about partisan motives, except that I referred back to the language that he had used, and said perhaps the same reason would apply for keeping out votes as would apply for getting them in. That was all I said, and I said that in a low tone of voice.

Mr. VEST. I make no assault on the Senator from Illinois. He is like myself. I make no pretensions to be an esthetic statesman. I suppose I am a politician. I fight for my party, and hope always to do so. I am perfectly satisfied with my party. It represents, I believe, the sound constitutional theories of this Government. I never rose to that esthetic pedestal where I could not tell a friend from a foe. The Senator from Illinois has never been accused of that, nor have I. Therefore I meant nothing personal. I simply meant to say that if the members of this body, in view of the record which these people have made, now can undertake to say in view of their declarations that there is no ground here to believe that they are acting without regard to the will of the Congress of the United States, then I must conclude that some partisan feeling has entered into a discussion which should admit of only the most impartial consideration and action.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire simply to take the floor. As the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived and there is other business, I will give way.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 1) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

JOINT RULES FOR THE TWO HOUSES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the concurrent resolution concerning the joint rules for the Senate and House of Representatives. The pending amendment, moved by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In Rule IX, paragraph 2, line 8, after the word "agreed," strike out "unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to perfect the bill after amendment."

Mr. FRYE. I do not think that amendment helps the rule at all; neither does it hurt it at all, and if the Senator who proposed it desires it, I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read.

Mr. INGALLS. I think upon reflection, after hearing the observations made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], perhaps the amendment should be modified so as to provide that conference committees shall only make such changes in the text as are necessary to harmonize the bill with the amendments in language. That was the object I had in view, and I understand that all those who have spoken agree that that ought to be done, that the liberty of a conference committee ought to extend no further than that. Therefore I will submit such a modification of my amendment as will bring about that result, changing the clause so that it shall read:

> Unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to harmonize the text with the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I see no objection to that, and I think that will accomplish all that the Senator desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The precise language of the amendment will be written by the Secretary and reported.

Mr. FRYE. In the last line, clause 2, strike out the word "perfect" and insert the word "harmonize."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be read.

Mr. FRYE. Strike out the word "bill," in the same line, and insert the word "text," and strike out "after" and insert "with" and also the word "the."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, after the word "to," it is moved to strike out the words "perfect the bill after" and insert the words "harmonize the text with the;" so as to read:

> Unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to harmonize the text with the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Let the whole part of the rule containing that subject be read as it will read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> It shall not be in order for a conference committee to consider or include in their report matter on a subject not in dispute between their respective Houses; nor shall the committee change the text of a bill, joint or concurrent resolution, to which both Houses have agreed, unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to harmonize the text with the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, that rule as now proposed makes a very serious change, as I understand it, in the parliamentary law in regard to conference committees, and one which in some important emergencies—one, particularly, where a measure was under the charge of my honorable friend from Maine, himself and others—which may arise, would have been found very inconvenient and will be so found hereafter. That is, it prohibits a conference except upon matters where a dispute has already arisen between the two Houses.

In the history of legislative bodies it is often found exceedingly convenient to accompany an original proposition with a request for a conference committee, without waiting for a dispute, in order that a dispute may not arise. Suppose, with these joint rules in force, we were approaching the end of a Congress instead of being at its beginning; suppose we were approaching some occasion when the existence of these joint rules should be found very important, we should send down an original proposition to the other House with a request for a conference. That is perfectly in order. It is just what the Senator from Maine did with one bill—I have forgotten now what it was, but something relating to the shipping proposition, I think. We made a new amendment, and the question was discussed of his right to move a conference, but we sent down, on his motion, the proposition with an original request for a conference.

It seems to me this rule should be so modified as to limit the prohibition to dealing with matters not in dispute between the two Houses, only to measures where matters in dispute between the two Houses have been committed to committees of conference, that they shall not then go beyond the borders of their jurisdiction and undertake to agree upon something out of their own head which has not been submitted to either of the two Houses.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the case to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers does not bear the interpretation he places upon it, and historically it does not sustain his position. The fact was that we passed a bill in this body, and when it was sent over to the House of Representatives we accompanied it with a request for a committee of conference. That is the only way. We can not ask a committee of conference on something that never has occurred.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. Allow me to recall the history. The House sent up a bill on some subject connected with commerce. The Senator from Maine desired to annex to that bill a proposition originating here in regard to, if I recollect aright, the removal of certain taxes and burdens upon American shipping—pilot dues and other things. He desired to lose no time, in the first place, by having the House disagree and then the message come asking for a conference committee, and he desired in the next place to have the advantage which the right to report at any time of a conference committee in the House would give his measure there. So he moved his amendment, which was an original proposition here. It was adopted, and then the Senate asked for a committee of conference.

Mr. INGALLS. That amendment was first adopted in the Senate to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; but before the House had disagreed to it.

Mr. INGALLS. Very true.

Mr. HOAR. There was no controversy, therefore, between the two branches. In that debate it was clearly shown by precedents which were looked up and cited that you might within the parliamentary law ask for a conference committee when you sent down an original proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly; but that does not change the aspect of the case that we are now considering. The motion for a committee of conference was sent down with the amendment in advance for the purpose simply, as the Senator says, of obtaining a parliamentary advantage in point of time. It does not change at all the question that is involved in my amendment. It was merely the effort on the part of the Senate to get a parliamentary advantage. It can not be considered in any way whatever as bearing upon the question whether or not conference committees ought to be limited to amendments that have been considered by either House, or whether they shall be at liberty to play whatever tricks they please with the text of bills that are submitted to them for consideration.

Mr. HOAR. My remark was not addressed at all to the Senator's amendment, which I agree to. It has nothing to do with it. The Senator misconceived it. I asked for the reading of the whole rule and then pointed out to the Senate the fact that the rule as drawn would change the parliamentary law so that the House never could ask for a committee of conference unless a dispute first had arisen. This is the language:

It shall not be in order for a conference committee to consider or include in their report matter or subjects not in dispute between their respective Houses.

You may have a conference in advance of disagreement. That is no part of the Senator's amendment; the amendment does not affect that; that is in the original rule. It seems to me, therefore, that this rule should be so limited, not the part the Senator has moved to amend but the other part, as to prohibit them when a matter in dispute has been committed to them from going beyond it.

Mr. INGALLS. Now take the case to which the Senator has just called my attention; had not a dispute arisen?

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. INGALLS. Why? Whenever the Senate adopted an amendment to the House bill a dispute had arisen, and the only question was whether we should bring it to the attention of the House of Representatives by asking a conference committee before or after they had acted on the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The dispute had not arisen parliamentarily until that amendment had gone down to the House and they had non-concurred in the amendment. But still, whether that be true or not in that case, it is very well settled, and will be very often found convenient, that we may do what was then done. We might pass an original bill on the last day of the session, and, knowing that if there were a day's delay the bill would be lost, we might desire to communicate to the House formally and officially the reasons that had governed us in the passage of the bill or resolution before the House acted upon it at all. That is, the object of the conference might be to prevent a dispute ever arising; and although that is a rare occasion in our American parliamentary history, it is something which may arise in very important cases. There is no earthly reason for tying up the parliamentary powers of the two bodies by prohibiting that.

Mr. FRYE. I think the Senator is slightly mistaken. The bill to which he refers was a bill which came from the House, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and by the committee amendments to it were reported, and when I reported it to the Senate and action was had I moved all of the recommendations of the Senate committee as amendments to the House bill. Then I moved a committee of conference. A discussion arose on the point as to whether or not I could move a committee of conference, there being no dispute. The authorities which I cited satisfied the presiding officer that I was right, because under parliamentary rule a dispute has arisen the very moment an amendment has been made by one House to the other's proposition. That is a parliamentary construction, and it was the construction given then.

Now, if the Senator will observe, I have provided in this rule for exactly that case, which never before was provided for in a rule of the Senate, in the first clause:

When a bill, joint or concurrent resolution, has passed one House and been amended in the other, it shall be in order to move a committee of conference.

The whole struggle over that proposition of mine was on the question whether or not in parliamentary view I had a right to move a conference, there having been an amendment only and no non-concurrence and no insistence, and the Chair decided according to parliamentary law, which is, that the moment an amendment is adopted by one House to a bill of the other, that moment a dispute commences between the two Houses, and concurrence or refusal to concur and insistence are not at all necessary to establish that position where a conference may be asked. Now under this rule I have so far amended the previous practice as to make provision for exactly that case where one House proposes an amendment.

I desired to go one step further and to put into the rule that you might ask a conference on a bill sent originally from one House to the other House. I examined the authorities with a good deal of care, and could find in all only two occasions where it had ever been attempted in Congress, and I found on examining the authorities on parliamentary law that they were all against it, and I gave it up. I have made one advance in this rule from anything that was ever done in a rule, that upon an amendment being offered you might call for a committee of conference; and that was the case which I had exactly.

Mr. HOAR. But the thing was put by the Senate, if I am not very much mistaken; of course I shall defer to the recollection of my friend from Maine who had charge of that matter, but I feel quite confident that the Senate went on the ground that it was not necessary that a dispute should have arisen, and that you might ask for a conference in advance of a dispute. I move this amendment to the rule——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one amendment pending to a part of the rule.

Mr. HOAR. Let that be agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment be read again. I think it requires, for good language, another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, paragraph 2 of Rule IX, strike out the word "perfect" and insert "harmonize the text with;" so as to read:

It shall not be in order for a conference committee to consider or include in their report matter or subjects not in dispute between their respective Houses, nor shall the committee change the text of a bill, joint or concurrent resolution, to which both Houses have agreed, unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to harmonize the text with the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the first two words, "the text," be stricken out and "it" substituted.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not entirely satisfied with the language that has been suggested even yet. One of the great masters of human phraseology has suggested to me language that I think will be a great deal better, and that is to insert the words "to conform the text to the." "Harmonize" is a vague word, with many significations, and I suggest that the amendment be "to conform the text to the."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment as modified will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out the words "perfect the bill after" and insert the words "conform the text to the;" so as to read:

Unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to conform the text to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now, I move at the beginning to amend the second clause of article 9, after the word "Houses," in the fourth line, by inserting these words:

Whenever a matter in dispute between the two Houses is committed to a conference committee—

Then, in line 5, strike out the words "a conference" and insert the word "said;" so as to read:

Whenever a matter in dispute between the two Houses is committed to a conference committee it shall not be in order for said committee to consider or include in their report matter or subjects not in dispute between their respective Houses.

That will prevent the rule from making, as it now does, an absolute prohibition of ever asking a conference committee on a matter which is not in dispute.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the word "Houses," insert:

Whenever a matter in dispute between the two Houses is committed to a conference committee.

So as to read:

Whenever a matter in dispute between the two Houses is committed to a conference committee, it shall not be in order for said committee to consider or include in their report matter or subjects not in dispute between their respective Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRYE. Let the Chief Clerk read the whole clause as it will be after the amendment. I do not know that I got it exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In Rule IX, paragraph 2, line 4, after the word "Houses," insert:

Whenever a matter in dispute between the two Houses is committed to a conference committee—

So as to read:

2. All committees of conference shall meet at the call of their chairman, and shall state verbally or in writing, as they may choose, the reasons for the actions of their respective Houses touching the amendment or amendments in dispute between the two Houses. Whenever a matter in dispute between the two Houses is committed to a conference committee, it shall not be in order for said committee to consider or include in their report matter or subjects not in dispute between their respective Houses, nor shall the committee change the text of a bill, joint or concurrent resolution, to which both Houses have agreed, unless it becomes necessary to change the text in order to conform the text to the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I do not like the repetition of the words "the text" there.

Mr. HOAR. That does not come into my amendment. That does not affect this matter at all.

Mr. FRYE. That is true. I do not see how the Senator's amendment effects the purpose which he was seeking.

Mr. HOAR. As the rule is now drawn it declares henceforth as a principle of parliamentary law for this Congress that it shall not be in order in either branch of Congress to ask for a conference committee unless a dispute has already arisen. In my judgment it is now within the parliamentary law to make that request. Certainly it can do no harm, and I desire to preserve that authority. The rule does not in the least affect in the case provided for by the Senator from Kansas the original rule. It simply changes the phraseology, the sentence meaning exactly what it does now, so as not to include that case. That is all.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that. I fail to see how it does the slightest harm, even under my view of the rule.

Mr. HOAR. It does not, of course, do any harm.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. Now if the President will have the Chief Clerk read the last three lines of clause 2, I want to change them. There are three repetitions of the words "the text," which seem to me offensive.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall the committee change the text of a bill, joint or concurrent resolution, to which both Houses have agreed, unless it becomes necessary to change the text.

Mr. FRYE. Now put in "it" instead of "the text;" so as to read "becomes necessary to change it."

The CHIEF CLERK. In the last line strike out "the text" and insert "it;" so as to read:

Unless it becomes necessary to change it in order to conform the text to the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. "In order to conform it."

Mr. INGALLS. The words "change the text" might as well all be stricken out. Those words are not necessary to the sense.

Mr. FRYE. Those four words may as well come out. "Unless it becomes necessary in order to conform the text to the amendment" would be better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine proposes to strike out the words "change the text."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the adoption of the proposed ninth joint rule as amended.

The rule was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments?

Mr. FRYE. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole has gone through with all the clauses of these joint rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Has it been reported to the Senate?

Mr. FRYE. It has not been reported to the Senate. It is necessary now to report it to the Senate with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments proposed the resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The concurrent resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the vote on the amendments may be taken in gross.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair will put the question on the amendments in gross unless a separation be called for.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the concurrent resolution providing for joint rules.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF BANKS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to consider at this time Senate bill No. 382, order of business 3, being a bill to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, with the leave of my friend from Tennessee, to have the unfinished business, which is the district court bill, laid before the Senate. I will then consent that it be laid aside informally for any other business. I do not desire any action on it today.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill in order is the bill (S. 6) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes, pending which the Senator from Massachusetts yields to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HOAR. No, it is to be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed that the pending bill be laid aside informally with a view to consider the next bill on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me to have the next bill on the Calendar passed. It is a bill of the same character precisely as that just acted on, simply to change a bank's name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending bill with a view to consider Senate bill No. 126.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask to be relieved from service upon the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The request was acceded to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Mines and Mining. That will be considered as agreed to unless objection be made.

Mr. CHACE. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Claims. That request will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. How shall the vacancies be filled?

Several SENATORS. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection; and the Chair appoints the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to fill the vacancies upon the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Committee on Railroads, and the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

COMMITTEES.

The committees as now arranged are as follows:

STANDING COMMITTEES.

On Agriculture and Forestry—Messrs. Miller of New York (chairman), Blair, Plumb, Van Wyck, Sawyer, George, Fair, Gibson, and Jones of Arkansas.

On Appropriations—Messrs. Allison (chairman), Dawes, Plumb, Hale, Mahone, Beck, Cockrell, Call, Gorman, and Logan.

To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—Messrs. Jones of Nevada (chairman), Chace, and Vance.

On Civil Service and Retrenchment—Messrs. Hawley (chairman), Dawes, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Miller of California, Pike, Voorhees, Walthall, Wilson of Maryland, and Berry.

On Claims—Messrs. Pike (chairman), Hoar, Dolph, Spooner, Jackson, Fair, Jones of Arkansas, Gray, and Mitchell of Oregon.

On Coast Defenses—Messrs. Dolph (chairman), Cameron, Sewell, Hawley, Maxey, McPherson, and Fair.

On Commerce—Messrs. McMillan (chairman), Jones of Nevada, Conger, Frye, Miller of New York, Dolph, Cameron, Ransom, Coke, Vest, Gorman, Jones of Florida, and Kenna.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Ingalls (chairman), Riddleberger, Pike, Palmer, Miller of California, Harris, Vance, Brown, and Blackburn.

On Education and Labor—Messrs. Blair (chairman), Mahone, Miller of New York, Bowen, Palmer, Call, Pugh, Payne, and Walthall.

On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Saulsbury (chairman), Call, and Allison.

On Enrolled Bills—Messrs. Bowen (chairman), Sabin, and Colquitt.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENT OFFICE ROOMS.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the joint resolution of the House which was laid on the table yesterday be taken up at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the joint resolution received yesterday from the House of Representatives be now taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. A single word of explanation, Mr. President. The Commissioner of Patents has been assigned to different rooms in the building of the Interior Department, and it becomes necessary to fit them up and repair them. The Secretary of the Interior and also the Commissioner of Patents think that the power exists now to take from the contingent fund the sum necessary for that purpose, but the Comptroller of the Treasury has doubts about it, and so they request that this resolution may be passed. I think there is no necessity for referring it to a committee. I will ask, however, that a single amendment may be made; that is, after the word "necessary," in line 7, to insert the words "fit up and;" so as to read:

As may be necessary to fit up and put in proper repair the rooms in the Interior Department building, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the bill (S. 6) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 18, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration Senate joint resolution No. 1, filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class "other than members of Congress" shall be filled by the reappointment of John Maclean of New Jersey, Asa Gray of Massachusetts, Henry Coppee of Pennsylvania, and the appointment of Montgomery C. Meigs, of the city of Washington, vice William T. Sherman, whose term has expired and who is no longer a citizen of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read three times, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the damage by storm to Governor's Island, New York Harbor, and asking an appropriation for continuing the sea-wall around the island; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FORT CANBY, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting detailed estimates of the cost of protecting roads and public buildings at Fort Canby, Washington Territory, against the waters of Baker's Bay; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE RULES.

Mr. MORRISON. I call up as a privileged question the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the report of the Committee on Rules. The question is upon an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, from line 62 to line 77, the following:
"On Expenditures in the State Department, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures in the War Department, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures in the Navy Department, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures in the Interior Department, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to consist of seven members;
"On Expenditures on Public Buildings, to consist of seven members," and insert as follows:
"On Public Expenditures, to consist of fifteen members."

Mr. SPRINGER. I have moved to strike out these various committees and create one committee consisting of fifteen members. My object is not to destroy any imaginary good that these committees might produce if allowed to exist, but it is to bring the responsibility of making these investigations within such a number of members as will insure some work being done by the committees.

I also have in view the saving of the public funds. I have been a member of Congress for ten years, and my observation with regard to these committees is that in nearly all cases, after their appointment, organization, and the election of a clerk, the committees practically cease to exist, and nothing further is done. We have been paying about $25,000 a year for clerks to these committees, which would amount to $250,000 in the last ten years for clerkships to committees that have done no work, except in a few cases to which I shall refer.

I hold in my hand indices showing the reports of these committees during the last two Congresses, which may be taken as a sample of the work generally done by these committees on Departmental expenditures. With one or two exceptions these indices show simply the appointment of the committee and the authorization of a clerk to it; and there the record stops. The exception is in the case of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, of which during the last Congress I had the honor to be the chairman. That committee made several reports, and was engaged very industriously, as all gentlemen who were members of the committee will testify, in the work assigned to it. But with this exception none of these committees during the last Congress or the preceding Congress, or for any number of years within my recollection except during the Forty-fourth Congress, made any reports whatever.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is it not the purpose in forming these committees that they shall stand ready for the occurrence of such a necessity for investigation as did arise in the last Congress in the case of the particular committee of which my colleague was chairman?

Mr. SPRINGER. That was the intention, I have no doubt; and I propose that we create one committee which will be a good one and will stand ready to do this work, a committee consisting of fifteen members, which can be divided into subcommittees, and can no doubt perform any work that may be required by any emergency in the future. But if there should arise hereafter some extraordinary occasion for investigation, I have no doubt the House would promptly respond by creating a special committee for that purpose.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman says he would like to have "one good committee." I hope he does not mean to intimate that these other committees have been bad.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; I mean nothing of the kind. The gentleman may, if he chooses, indulge in reflections of that kind, but I do not. I am talking about useful committees as distinguished from committees that have no work to do.

I believe that this proposition is in the interest of economy. During the last ten years it has cost $250,000 to pay the clerks to these useless committees. The President has set us an example of economy; I hope this House will respond to it by cutting off some of the useless expenditures of this body. It is for this purpose and to secure more efficient service that I have moved this amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I trust the motion of my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] will not prevail. It is based, as is every other proposition made here in opposition to the report of the committee, chiefly upon the assumption that it will result in curtailing, limiting, or cutting down expenditures of public money. My colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] refers to the expense that is to result from the employment of clerks to these committees, which he says ought not to have clerks. Why, sir, I remember in the last Congress, when my colleague was the chairman of one of these committees, one clerk was not enough for him; so important was his committee that he had to have two. He asked for them and they were voted to him.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I had but one.

Mr. MORRISON. Two. It is so reported in the Directory.

Mr. BLOUNT. Allow me to suggest that the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department in a former Congress made the investigation that resulted in articles of impeachment against the then Secretary of War, General Belknap.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. But it answers the gentleman's statement that these committees have nothing to do.

Mr. MORRISON. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that these committees constitute the eyes, the ears, and the hands of the House. In fact, I believe it was claimed in some cases, when they were making their investigations, that they also constituted the nose or noses of the House, for they were called "smelling committees." [Laughter.] Be that as it may, a great deal of good has resulted from the work done by them, and I am sure they should not and will not be abolished. During the late canvass especially, and in fact in all our recent Democratic canvasses, we have heard it proclaimed everywhere, at least wherever a Democratic speech was made, that we wanted to see or "look at the books." Now we are in possession and have an opportunity to see the books; and I hope we shall not begin by closing our eyes and refusing to look at them.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope you will not. You will have some books of your own in a few years that you will need to look at, and there ought to be committees of this kind for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. We had these same committees in the last Congress; there is nothing new in this proposition to continue them.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, in the last Congress the work of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was very effective. It made clear to the whole country that great abuses existed in that Department. In the investigation which it made it had the sympathy and aid of the chief of that Department, Attorney-General Brewster. All these other committees on expenditures in the various Departments will no doubt, if continued now, have the sympathy in every case of the head of the particular Department. If there is any truth whatever in the charges we made during the last canvass that abuses have crept into all the Departments of this Government, we ought certainly to stand ready to investigate them by every means in our power. These committees existed heretofore when the Republicans were in power, not only in this House, but when they had the Presidency.

Now, since they have gone out of power and we have come in, I can not see that the Republicans can afford to vote against the continuance of these committees, which existed when they had control of the House as well as the administration. To do so would be to confess that they are afraid of the investigation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. One committee can do it all.

Mr. HERBERT. No, one committee can not do it all. One committee could not have done seven times as much work as the Springer committee did in the last Congress. It is absolutely impossible, and if these committees shall have anything at all to do, and I believe they all will, they will have their hands full. Already, under the Interior Department, in the matter of geodetic surveys, abuses most outrageous have been exposed by investigations instituted by that Executive Department of this Government. Let this House stand ready to second all such efforts. Let us not tie our hands. Let us not take away from ourselves the means of exposing and correcting these abuses. Those were the reasons that actuated the Committee on Rules in perpetuating these several committees, and they ought to be sufficient, in my judgment, with this House to induce it to sustain the Committee on Rules in its recommendations. This is not the time to make the reform, if it shall be one, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] insists upon.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Alabama, that he need not appeal to the Republican side of this House to vote to abolish these committees. We do not propose any such measure; but, on the contrary, it comes from the Democratic side of this House. It is true that when the Republican party were in power there was little necessity for any such committees, but the prospect now is that they will be useful in the future, and we are therefore all going to vote to continue them. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. If these several committees, Mr. Speaker, are useless, it must be because they have neglected to perform the duties appointed to them by the rules. Let us look at the duties assigned to them. They are as follows:

34. The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several Departments of the Government, and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demads; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payments of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the eight standing committees on the public expenditures in the several Departments.

If these committees will perform faithfully what they are authorized by the rules to perform I know nothing which will tend more to correct administration, toward economy in expenditures, and to a correction of the abuses which for a long time have crept into the operations of the Federal Government.

If one committee should attempt to do this it would be found to be impossible to go through all the Departments. Any one committee that will discharge the duties pointed out by this provision in any one of the Departments of the Government will find ample labor and ample employment and it may render to the Government valuable service.

I am informed these committees have existed since 1816. There have been within the last eight or ten years some investigations made by these committees. The fact that their duties may have been neglected is no argument against the utility of the committees, but it should be understood those who are appointed to perform the duties of these committees will be expected to perform their duties with fidelity to the House and to the country.

Besides, there are no clerks allowed to these committees. If an emergency shall arise requiring a clerk it could be provided. So there is no additional expense incurred.

With three hundred and twenty-five members in this House there is ample material for all the committees provided by the rule and ample work for all of those committees if they shall discharge the duties assigned to them. Therefore I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted, but that these several committees will be continued.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The question, Mr. Speaker, is whether this work can be better done by a number of smaller committees or by one large committee. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman who has submitted the proposition, that it would be better to have one large committee on expenditures than to have a number of small committees. A large committee could be divided into subcommittees, and that is the practice in the British Parliament, just as the Appropriations Committee is divided into subcommittees. After that Committee on Appropriations had recommended its appropriations then here would come in another committee to look after the expenditure of that money. I believe that one committee taking all the Departments, inquiring into all the expenditures, following them up—a committee having the power to do so, and a committee intended to exercise that power not only in this House but in future Houses—would be more efficient than a number of smaller committees. I am therefore in favor of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the fact is, these committees on expenditures in the several Departments are not allowed clerks under the rule except by the report of the Committee on Accounts, which has to be approved by the House itself. So that the whole subject is under the control of the House, and not a single solitary dollar of expense will be added by the continuation of these committees except under special order of the House itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. Which always follows.

Mr. HILL. You wanted two or three last Congress, and you got them because you asked for them and because the House thought you ought to have them. That is the fault of the House and not the fault of the rules.

I dislike to hear members quote the rules of the British Parliament as a precedent for the action of this House. That Parliament would do better, Mr. Speaker, to follow our example. I am opposed to following the example of the British Parliament, or that of any other monarchical form of government on the face of the earth. Let them follow ours.

As has been remarked by the gentleman from Texas on my right [Mr. REAGAN], the time may come when these committees may be useful even if there is nothing for them to do now. Why then abolish them when they are accompanied by no expense? If there is work to do they can report it to the House, and ask the authority of this House to enable them to do that work, and that is all there is of it. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question upon the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope my colleague will yield to me to make a single correction.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well.

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee of which I was chairman in the last session of Congress had a clerk and a messenger. The messenger may have been put in the Directory as a clerk, but the resolution under which he was appointed called him a messenger, and he was a messenger, although sometimes he acted as a clerk, and was an exceeding useful man. Further, let me say, that committee had use for both these officers the whole session. I do not think that any committee of the House sat more hours or did more hard work than did that committee. But that was the only one of these committees named here that did any work; and hence I was of opinion that one committee, that had work to do, would succeed in doing more business than the whole lot of these committees together.

Mr. MORRISON. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clause 2. He shall appoint all select committees which shall be ordered by the House from time to time.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to this clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the second paragraph of Rule X, line 86, insert:
"The jurisdiction of said committees shall be as prescribed in the rules or laws and resolutions ordering select committees, but no general legislation shall be in order on any general appropriation bill, nor as an amendment thereto; and no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuance of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Mr. HAMMOND. I propose to incorporate that provision as a part of the rule just read after the list of committees, in line 86, and before we come to the consideration of Rule XI, in which we will have a contest over the distribution of the powers of the House among the committees, that being the rule that prescribes the powers and duties of the committees.

It is well, Mr. Speaker, that we should understand whether the appropriations committees of this House will have power longer to put general legislation upon their bills or not. If they have that power, gentlemen may vote in one way who would occupy a different position if the power was taken away from them. I think it is proper, therefore, to define in advance the jurisdiction, or the want of it, of these various committees. The amendment which I have sent to the desk regulating the jurisdiction of the committees is almost exactly that reported by the Committee on Rules, except that it leaves out the words "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government," as prescribed in Rule XXI.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement or offering an amendment, but I desire to save the point of order that this does not belong to this part of the resolution before the House and is not in order in this section.

Mr. HAMMOND. After I have offered an amendment and spoken for five minutes upon it it is too late for the gentleman to make the point of order. But there is no point of order such as the gentleman suggests, nor was any point of order reserved.

Mr. MORRISON. The point of order I make is that it is not germane here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a matter for the House to determine in what part of the report it will insert any particular provision. Although the Chair may agree that it does not harmonize with the general tenor of the report at this point, it is a question for the House to decide.

Mr. MORRISON. I insist if it goes in at all that it shall go in in connection with the section to which it properly belongs.

Mr. HAMMOND. The natural thing is to find out in advance whether this or the other side intends to retain the power to keep riders on appropriation bills or not. If they do, one course of conduct may be necessary. If they do not, quite a different course may be necessary, and therefore I hope that the House will agree to come to a vote at once upon this most important question; and when I say at once I do not mean without debate, but I mean without postponing the question until we shall have reached the consideration of Rule XXI, after all the other adjustments of the duties of committees have been made, for it may be that if that delay be had, then what gentlemen suppose obtainable now may not be within the grasp of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this question had better be deferred to the point in the report of the committee where it can be properly considered. The proper policy would seem to be, when we reach that point, to consider it where the amendment is germane to the subject-matter, and we can then take it up and consider it.

I believe there is no doubt but that the rule covers it as reported, but if it be necessary to make it stronger I shall be in favor of making it stronger. Still I see no connection that it has with the present subject which will not permit it to be deferred to that point.

There is one question which has been debated on this floor at great length; and I fancy, sir, that under the amendment now offered there is a covert attempt to obscure that question. I prefer to meet that question fairly when it is presented, and I am opposed to any amendment of the rules at this time which shall have the effect to obscure it.

Mr. MORRISON. Unless the gentleman from Georgia consents his amendment shall come at the appropriate place I shall move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done; an amendment can not be laid on the table.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that we should have a fair opportunity to vote upon this question of whether we are to have hereafter riders upon appropriation bills.

Mr. MORRISON. You will have that opportunity.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It occurs to me we ought to have that opportunity now and that we ought to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, whether we distribute the appropriation bills or continue those bills with the Appropriations Committee. It does seem to me if we are to meet this question fairly we ought to be permitted to vote upon it before we reach the question of the distribution of the bills.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has said this amendment had better come in its regular order. He thinks that perhaps there is something covert in it. I appeal to those who know me in this House to sustain me in the assertion that I do nothing covertly. My purpose is plain. It is to find out in the beginning, before these additional avenues to the Treasury shall be opened, how far these several appropriation bills may carry general legislation. I want to know when the flood comes how high it must rise before I vote.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say this to the gentleman, that as far as this side of the House is concerned he will find us a unit—every man of us.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Why not vote it now?

Mr. HISCOCK. And I say that also to the gentleman from Ohio, there will be no division on this side of the House in voting for a proposition at the right and proper time to eliminate all legislation from appropriation bills.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Let us make our record now.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have the right to say that precipitating the amendment at this time was intended to obscure another question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not see how voting upon this proposition will obscure anything. It proposes what the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] admits is correct, that no matter whether these bills are distributed or whether they remain with the Appropriations Committee there shall be no legislation upon appropriation bills. What can be obscured by that declaration?

Does not this proposition remove any obscurity? Does it not leave the question clear from any other as to whether or not the appropriation bills are to be separated? And will not the House be better able to reach a conclusion by a direct vote upon this proposition than it will be by taking the order in which these several propositions will be brought to us as presented in this report? I trust we shall be allowed to have a vote now. There can be nothing covert in this proposition. Take the vote now and when you approach the other questions you will approach them absolutely free to act. I believe now is the time that this vote should be taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 580) granting a pension to Julia D. Grant; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

THE RULES.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is unfortunate that my friend from Georgia has thought proper to present this subject at this time, but I do not know what action the House may think proper to take, and I desire to offer an amendment to the pending proposition. I therefore offer as a substitute that which I send to the desk.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say I was under a wrong apprehension when I stated my impression that the pending propositions related only to the question whether there should be legislation on appropriation bills. I find it does involve other questions.

The Clerk read Mr. HOLMAN'S proposed substitute, as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order upon any general appropriation bill, or be received as an amendment thereto; but provisions or amendments for the direct reduction of the number, salary, and compensation of officers and employés of the United States shall be in order on a general appropriation bill if germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is that offered now as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] now on the floor as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire whether it is in order at this point?

The SPEAKER. As a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia it is in order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. At what point is it proposed that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia shall come in?

The SPEAKER. After line 86.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the proposition I submit takes the rule as reported by the Committee on Rules in exact terms, including the words "and for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government." It retains those words and adds the language which I desire the Clerk to read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order upon any appropriation bill or be received as an amendment thereto; but provisions or amendments for the direct reduction of the number, salary, and compensation of officers and employés of the United States shall be in order on a general appropriation bill if germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the language incorporated in the rule by the committee, "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government," makes it the same as the old rule adopted in 1836, and manifestly opens a very wide door, unless by a subsequent provision you impose a clear restriction. It is for this purpose I have offered these additional words. I certainly hope that the power of the House to reduce, on any bill to which the matter is germane, the number and salaries of officers of the United States will not be taken away. If these bills are to be distributed, let each of the committees having charge of appropriation bills exercise this power. I hope that no gentleman will object to the House retaining this power of retrenchment on proper bills.

I apprehend that in the absence of a severe restriction the words in italics, reported as an addition to this rule, would be found mischievous to the last degree, because the history of this clause, which was contained in the old rule, must become ultimately, from the necessity of the case, a portion of the rule; and when originally adopted as a part of the old rule it was adopted avowedly for the purpose of allowing the increase of salaries. It was so decided at the beginning, and so decided up to the time of the passage of the famous salary measure, which resulted in the adoption of the rule that it is now sought to abrogate, the vital part of which will be retained if the proposition I have submitted as an amendment be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish merely to say that this proposition does not properly come in at this point; and therefore I hope it will be voted down, that it may come up in its regular order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is the actual fact about the situation. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] is undoubtedly correct, and, as all of us will bear witness, nobody suspects him of any methods that are unsuitable.

Mr. HAMMOND. That may be true, except as to the vice-president of the other side.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is something I should say almost anywhere.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman did not understand my remark. I said the gentleman's suggestion was probably true except as to the vice-president of that side, who has said he did suspect.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not understand the allusion. I desire simply to remark that while the gentleman from Georgia has said the truth in regard to his intentions and his duties toward this House, nevertheless, like all of us, he is perfectly willing to avail himself of any fair and honorable parliamentary strategy; and his object in pressing this matter now is to disarrange the order of affairs. In the report of the committee this matter is in its proper place and regular order; and it is perfectly apparent from the discussions in this House what will be the result of the vote. Everybody must understand precisely what is going to be done. Now the object of putting this proposition forward is to make some confusion in members' minds on this subject. It seems to me perfectly plain that the proper method of procedure for us is to take up the matter in its regular order, as proposed in the report of the committee. I therefore hope, for my part, that this proposition will be voted down for the present, in order that it may be met and voted upon by the House in language which, in my view, would be more suitable for accomplishing the object which the gentleman from Georgia, in common with myself, undoubtedly has in view.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the object of "the gentleman from Georgia" and that of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] are very different. To a certain extent we agree, but at a particular point we separate, he taking seven or eight roads and I trying to keep one, after we shall have determined what to do. If the power belongs to nine committees it will be a greater evil to add to that power than if it belongs to one. So it will be in proportion to the number of committees to which it may be distributed. This House can not know until a vote has been taken on it in what form the prohibition against riders may be made. There are various propositions, and gentlemen differ as to the verbiage of such restriction when it shall come in, and therefore I insist before we undertake to handle the question of distribution at all we ought to know where we are going. And if this is a mere objection to form or place, I admit that it is according to the report of the Committee on Rules, and I thought I had made myself plain that I have been fighting that report from the beginning to the end. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make this one explanation. I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana and will vote for it when it is reached in proper order, but I shall vote against all these amendments until the proper time has been reached.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my substitute.

The question then recurred on Mr. HAMMOND'S amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 86:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at the end of the second paragraph of Rule X, at the end of line 86, the following paragraph:

3. The jurisdiction of said committees shall be as prescribed in the rules or laws and resolutions ordering select committees. But no general legislation shall be in order on any general appropriation bill nor as an amendment thereto, and no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such works and objects as are already in progress and for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of Government.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is like the amendment which has just been voted upon, with the addition of the words "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government," which are printed in the bill in italics.

Mr. MORRISON. I hope it will be voted down.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DOUGHERTY rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentlemen who filed their amendments last evening to be printed in the RECORD that it is necessary to offer them upon the floor at the proper time; that is to say, when the clause to which they are in order shall be reached. The amendment sent up by the gentleman from Florida is to Rule XIV, which we have not yet reached.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I will reserve my amendment then until we reach Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XI.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. to the election of members: to the Committee on Elections;

2. to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States: to the Committee on Ways and Means;

3. to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, as herein provided, viz: for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies: to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out, in line 106, commencing with the word "as" and concluding with the word "deficiencies," in line 109.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the words which it is proposed to strike out—

As herein provided, viz: for legislative, executive, and judical expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois in order? Is not the question on concurring in the particular amendment of the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee is one entire proposition, but gentlemen have a right to a division in taking votes on it. The gentleman proposes an amendment to the report of the committee by striking out the words indicated, which the Chair thinks is proper.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Would it be in order to offer to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois an amendment giving to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the same privilege in relation to the organization of the State Department and the diplomatic service which is accorded to the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations; and to the Committee on Military Affairs the same privilege in relation to the organization of the War Department and the Army, and to the Committee on Naval Affairs like privilege as to bills relating to the naval establishment and the organization of the Navy Department?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that when he gets the floor in his own right it will be in order to offer that amendment at the proper place. Clause 49 of Rule XI is the one which prescribes the duties of committees as to the manner of making their reports. While the amendment would be more proper there than here, still it will be in order here if the gentleman thinks proper to offer it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to call attention to a remark made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] day before yesterday, I believe, and which is published in the CONGRES-SIONAL RECORD of the 17th instant. I send the RECORD to the Clerk's desk to be read where I have marked it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HISCOCK. Take my own experience with reference to those bills. I had the power; I grant it. And when I had it I did not bring in those bills early; I grant that. I could have done so if I had desired. But what did I do? I held back the legislative and sundry civil bills until away in July to force this House to pass the little internal-revenue bill and to pass the Tariff Commission bill.

Mr. RANDALL. There was a little log-rolling.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORRISON. Who log-rolled with you?

Mr. HISCOCK. I did it on the ground I have stated, and I say if you will examine the RECORD you will find that on the floor of this House I distinctly proclaimed my intention and policy to the country. My action was not covert. It was taken boldly and manfully. Whether I ought to have had that power or not, perhaps, sir, is questionable. Since I had it I chose to exercise it. And I believe in that particular case it was wisely exercised.

Mr. CANNON. All who heard the remarks which have just been read by the Clerk in the House of Representatives were profoundly struck with it. Indeed I may say throughout the length and breadth of the country it created a profound impression. The next morning there was nearly a column article in the New York Tribune in reference to it, from which article I read a short extract. After speaking of Mr. HISCOCK's very able speech—and it was an able speech—the writer of that article proceeded to say, among other things, as follows:

To Mr. HISCOCK, who was for two years chairman and for four years a member of the Appropriations Committee, the House to-day became indebted for a searching exposure of the arbitrary methods of that committee, and also for a powerful and convincing argument in favor of curtailing its enormous power. His speech was the most effective one delivered since the debate began. He remembered what most of the other speakers seemed to have forgotten—the necessity of enlightening the one hundred and thirty-five new members respecting the evils from which the House has suffered in the past and the importance of convincing them that the changes proposed will facilitate business and promote orderly legislation.

I can say that in the remarks which the gentleman from New York made the House got the impression, which I believe still remains, that the gentleman from New York as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-seventh Congress did have the power to withhold these bills by virtue of that chairmanship and did have power to control the business in this House; that hence it was an unsafe power, and that he was a shining example of its arbitrary use.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. I have but a few moments.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I only want to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that every member of the Forty-eighth Congress has the same opinion without being informed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, the gentleman insists on asking a question when I have but five minutes, but I will inform him before I get through.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROWELL took the floor and by consent yielded his time to Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House the highest question of privilege is the right of a member to a seat, which comes from the Elections Committee. Under the rules of the House the next question of privilege is the consideration of revenue bills, coming from the Committee on Ways and Means; and next the general appropriation bills, in the order of which I speak, the majority of this House always having the power to control its business under its rules. Now, then, I want to say to the House and to the gentleman from New York, who can correct me if I set down aught in error, in the Forty-seventh Congress we, the Republicans, commenced with a bare majority of 2. We had one hundred and forty-nine members and we caucused frequently. We had a caucus committee, of which I had the honor to be a member along with the gentleman from New York himself, I believe, and others. He was the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and I was a member of that committee. There was a majority of Republicans, barely a majority, in the Forty-seventh Congress, first session, and that majority concluded to pass important measures—the Edmunds bill, touching the Mormons; reports of the Committee on Elections for the purpose of seating members of this House who had been duly elected to the House but kept out of their seats by improper returns; and to do that we had to so amend the rules as to prevent filibustering; also to pass what was known as the little revenue bill, decreasing taxation some $25,000,000, and to extend the charters of the national banks by general legislation. All these were matters considered by the Republican caucus, and it is an open secret to every member on this side of the House that it was determined in caucus that no bills of any kind should obstruct these matters of legislation.

In pursuance of the determination of the House, or of the majority of the House in this matter, the gentleman from New York then in charge of the Committee on Appropriations did pursue the course pointed out as the organ of that committee, and speaking through the committee as the voice of the majority of the House of Representatives (not the voice of the gentleman from New York) indicated. And, Mr. Speaker, there is nobody that knew it better than did he; for while I have not time to read what he said upon that occasion—I wish I had—I have the remarks of the gentleman before me, his able speeches made in July and August, 1882, in the House, in which he speaks of this action and avows that it was had not as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but as all the Republican majority of this House at that time, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], and every other member on this floor who was a member of the Forty-seventh Congress on this side of the House, knows as the action of that Republican majority.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I would have been glad, sir, had further time been accorded to me, but I can not under the discussion allowed by the rules hope to extend the time. I will, however, if there be no objection, incorporate the remarks of the gentleman from New York in my remarks to show what the facts were to which I now refer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from New York made the other day as it found a lodgment in the minds of the members of this House, when punctured by the spear of fact, when you leave the domain of romance, fades like the baseless fabric of a vision. There is no man in this House of greater ability than the gentleman from New York, in my opinion; none for whom I entertain a higher respect, none more able when he keeps within the domain of fact and out of the domain of romance. I do not complain because the gentleman from New York changed his opinion touching the distribution of these bills since the Forty-sixth Congress, when he voted against the proposition, as shown by the record. Sir, he had a right to change.

But after the gentleman rose yesterday and corrected his speech in one matter and did not correct it in this I felt it to be my duty in the interest of fair play to call the attention of the House to these facts. And now, sir, I insert in the RECORD, in pursuance of notice given, a part of the speech of the gentleman from New York, made at the close of the Forty-seventh Congress, while he was chairman of the Appropriations Committee, as follows:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I may be pardoned for saying a word in reference to the late day at which the appropriation bills have been presented to the House. This has been a long and laborious session; and, sir, it has not been the intention of the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman to crowd its appropriation bills upon the attention of the House to the exclusion of other public business. We have recognized the fact that we came here not alone to pass appropriation bills to support the Government and enable it to discharge its various functions and duties, but that the country had the right to demand of us certain general legislation of great public benefit, and that it was our duty rather to hold back the appropriation bills that such general legislation might have consideration than to force the appropriation bills upon the House to the exclusion of that legislation if that exclusion would result in its defeat.

It was the duty of this Congress to reapportion the members of Congress to the various States. The last Congress failed in that great constitutional duty. It was a matter which we were to dispose of. The Constitution imposed it upon us. It took time; it took consideration. It received the necessary consideration at our hands; and a bill was perfected and passed with which I believe the whole country is satisfied.

Another important question has claimed the attention of Congress, the revision of the tariff. For years there has been an effort to readjust in some way the customs duties. The Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, and the Forty-sixth Congresses failed in all efforts in that direction, until it seemed to be the settled sentiment of the whole country that a tariff commission should be created to which this subject should be referred. The last Congress had failed to pass a law, though there was a public demand for such a measure. This Congress has considered the subject and disposed of it. No man can prophesy what result may come from it; but we have at least answered the demands of the country that the legislation should be had.

I shall not go through with all the various matters which have occupied the attention of this Congress; but there are one or two others to which I will refer. The Pacific coast has been for years agitated by Chinese immigration. The question within what restrictions or limits the Chinese should be allowed to immigrate to this country other Congresses had confronted as we confronted it. We believed a policy should be determined upon and the subject be removed from politics; that the people of the Pacific States and of the whole country, however the question might be determined, would be better off if it were settled. This Congress has considered and disposed of that question.

It is removed from politics. It has ceased to be a disquieting influence in the communities on the Pacific coast.

Sir, one other matter, perhaps in its effects not as widespread as the Chinese question, but more pernicious, more poisonous in my opinion, claimed the attention of Congress—the Mormon question. For twenty years or more that community, that government, has been allowed to have its Delegate seated on this floor. It almost seemed as if the Government of the United States was fostering the institution; that it was under the protection of the Federal Congress. It had increased, it had strengthened until as an ulcer in our social and political system it was recognized and abhorred by every Christian community throughout the length and breadth of the land.

There came to us in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses appeals from our constituents to destroy and do away with this offense to our civilization, yet those appeals were denied. This Congress, sir, has answered the appeals of Christian constituencies. It has perfected the legislation which we believe will destroy the institution of Mormon, the Mormon hierarchy, as a political force and political body. Appropriation bills were not pressed against that legislation.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another matter we have taken time to consider. We believed it was the duty of an American Congress before it disposed of its business, before its last days were reached, to settle the question of the title of members to their seats. We believed it was our right to know whether the gentleman whose vote and voice might offset or defeat the vote and voice of another was entitled to vote and voice. We believed, for the settlement of grave business and political questions by the American Congress, it was the first duty of Congress to purge itself of members not entitled to seats, and to seat in their places those entitled to them. We believed it was a duty we owed to the country that men who were elected should represent the constituencies which had elected them; and we believed that it was a duty we owed to these constituencies. We believed every constituency had the right of representation upon the floor of this House, and that he who had received a majority vote in a Congressional district should be the one to represent it.

We encountered great delay, but still we did consider these matters and questions to the exclusion of the consideration of appropriation bills, and we did get a vote upon the election cases which the Committee on Elections could bring before us. We did as a Republican party dispose of them, and at the first, the present session of Congress, rather than defer them to the last days of the last session, then to be disposed of by paying the full salary both to the contestant and the contestee without regard to our own rights or the rights of constituencies.

There is one other matter I must not forget. Coming into power, we believed that it was the duty of Congress to investigate the subject of taxation. There were the old war taxes, levied and collected year after year. We believed it was the duty of the Republican party to consider whether an overburdened people could not be relieved from some of them. We considered the question in this House. We have given to it all the time needed for debate. We have accomplished this, if our actions shall be approved by the Senate. We have removed from the people taxation to the amount of $35,000,000 a year at least.

Under our national banking law most of the charters of the banks were about to expire. Here was a question of pressing importance. That expiration, Mr. Chairman, with the consequent withdrawal of circulation, threatened a contraction of the currency, a disturbance of business, and almost a financial convulsion in the great business centers. We believed that our time was demanded to provide legislation on the subject, that it was the business of a Republican Congress not to pass appropriation bills, adjourn, and go home, but to devote itself to the business interests of the country, and that this was one question which demanded our closest attention.

It is not unfair to say, Mr. Chairman, that on this question as on others we were not aided by the opposition as a party. I concede, sir, that there were some patriotic men who joined hands with us in this legislation as they did in reference to other. But the fullest debate on this as on all questions was exacted, and in the end a law was passed by this House providing for the extension of bank charters, averting the financial panic and catastrophe impending.

As stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK], since then we have been borrowing money at 2 per cent. It will be well for him, to his credit I mean, and I am willing to have his expression preserved forever in my remarks.

I must beg the pardon of the committee for having taken up so much of its time, not so much in the discussion of the details of the bill as of the details of all the appropriation bills which have come before the House, and in the discussion of those great questions which have been the occasion of delay in the presentation and consideration of appropriation bills, which in my judgment afforded ample justification for whatever delay may have taken place.

I now move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting general debate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know what is the object of my colleague in moving this amendment. He has not stated it in his remarks. I presumed he desired to make a personal explanation. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment that I may speak to the question on its merits. My amendment is to strike out the words indicated in the amendment of my colleague and to insert after the word "Government" the word "except;" so that it will read:

To appropriations of the revenue for the support of the Government except as herein provided.

The object of my amendment is that the bills shall not be enumerated, but simply to provide that the appropriations for the support of the Government shall be left to the Committee on Appropriations "except as herein provided."

The legislative and executive bill and also the sundry civil bill, which are mentioned here, contained in them numerous items for the support of the Army and the Navy and the Post-Office Department, and relating to foreign affairs and Indian affairs. I hold in my hand the law passed at the last session upon these respective subjects; and it will be seen that page after page of the sundry civil bill is devoted to appropriations for the support of the Navy and the support of the Army and the support of the Indian Bureau. In a subsequent part of this report these subjects are referred to other committees. The enumeration of bills mentioned in this part of the report refers the same subjects to the Appropriations Committee. The result of this will be confusion worse confounded when the respective committees bring in their bills upon these subjects.

As stated by the gentleman from Indiana a day or two ago, the sundry civil bill has grown up from year to year to its present enormous proportions from having been merely a little bill to correct some omissions in the other bills. It is now composed entirely of those items for the support of the Government which might be put in any other of the bills of the House without any detriment to the public service or any marring of the harmony of these propositions. It is well known to gentlemen that a few years ago, when the sundry civil bill was about to be defeated, and when it was defeated, just before the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March, one of the committees of conference deliberately took page after page out of the sundry civil bill and put it in the legislative and executive bill in order to save those clauses; and that bill was passed, the sundry civil bill having been defeated.

The proposition as it now stands reported from the Committee on Rules refers item after item, line after line, relating to the same subject, to two different committees, and it will result in the greatest confusion when we come to consider these matters in Committee of the Whole on the reports of separate committees.

The proposition which I had referred to the Committee on Rules provided that two subjects should be referred to the respective committees; that all the subjects relating to foreign affairs and the Post-Office Department and the Army and the Navy should be referred to the committees having charge respectively of those branches of the service. This would require a recasting of this report, but it would secure harmony and perfect consistency in the apportionment of the duties of the several committees.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Two amendments are now pending. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia at the proper time. The Chair understands the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] strikes out the word "as."

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir. The proposition is to insert the word "except" before the word "as;" so that it will read "except as herein provided."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman then offers his amendment as a substitute for the amendment of his colleague [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] proposes to strike out the words which follow.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know whether my colleague desires to have his amendment voted on or not, as he did not speak on his amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offers as a substitute for that of his colleague [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that it be again reported, that it may be understood.

The amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, offered as a substitute, was again read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know if it would be in order to offer an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. SPRINGER. To avoid confusion I will withdraw my substitute for the present, and allow the vote to be taken on the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer as an amendment to the amendment what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs shall have the same privileges in reporting and having considered bills in relation to organizing the State Department and the consular and diplomatic service as are accorded to the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means.

The Committee on Military Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the War Department or the Army.

The Committee on Naval Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the Navy Department, the Navy, and additions of vessels to the same.

The Post-Office Committee shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the Post-Office Department, the transportation of the mails, and regulating rates of postage.

The Committee on Indian Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the regulation of Indian tribes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Gentlemen have asked me why I have offered this proposition. It will be observed I do not undertake to prescribe what are all the subjects of consideration of the Committee on Naval Affairs, or the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or the Committee on Military Affairs, of the Post-Office Committee or of the Committee on Indian Affairs; but my object is this: The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is to give all the appropriation bills to the Committee on Appropriations. The difficulty has been heretofore that by reason of the inability of the several committees having relation to the Departments to have a hearing upon this floor the Committee on Appropriations have been enabled to take charge of a very large part of the legislation of this House. This created infinite discontent on the part of the other committees of the House and has produced unwise and hasty legislation.

Again, sir, I think it ought to be in the power of some committee or this House other than the Committee on Appropriations to bring forward propositions relating to the organization of the Army or Navy or the United States, to the organization of the War Department, or any other Department, or the organization of the consular and diplomatic service, the reorganization of which has been recommended by the Secretary of State. Subjects of this kind we should be enabled to bring forward under the privileges contemplated by my amendment, the object of which is to give precedence on these special subjects, and none others, to these several committees in order that these great branches of the public service shall not be subordinated to less important questions, such as those of claims, &c. I trust that the House will see fit to agree to this proposition as an amendment at least to that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]; and when that shall have been done we shall be in better condition to determine whether these bills shall or shall not be distributed.

Mr. CANNON. I will withdraw my amendment, and the gentleman from Georgia can offer his as a direct proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. I offer the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois coupled with the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the proposition be read as it now stands.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I do.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renew it, modified by the addition of the proposition I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out in the report the words which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

As herein provided, viz: For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the words just read and to insert what the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs shall have the same privileges in reporting and having considered bills in relation to the organization of the State Department and the consular and diplomatic service as are accorded to the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means. The Committee on Military Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the War Department or the Army. The Committee on Naval Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the Navy Department and Navy and the addition of vessels to the same. The Post-Office Committee shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the organization of the Post-Office Department, transportation of the mails, and regulating rates of postage. The Committee on Indian Affairs shall have like privileges as to bills relating to the regulation of the Indian tribes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I have reoffered the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois (he having withdrawn it) because I was not willing that the House should be brought now to a direct vote on the proposition whether or not these bills should remain with the Committee on Appropriations. For one, I am not willing for them to remain where they are unless something shall be done giving to other committees of this House the right to report important legislation instead of allowing all such legislation to remain practically under the control of the Committee on Appropriations as heretofore.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think it must be obvious to the House that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] would be in its effect almost entirely destructive of the value of the privilege which he proposes to confer upon these various committees; in other words, he proposes to give to so many different committees the privilege of reporting their bills at any time that the value of the privilege is very largely impaired. The amendment is, I submit, at variance with the whole idea upon which this scheme of rules reported by the committee is predicated. It is conceded by the committee that there is a certain character of legislation so important that it is necessary it should be enacted in preference to all other business, in order that the Government may be carried on; hence the Committee on Appropriations and a few other committees have been heretofore accorded the privilege of reporting at any time. Now, the gentleman from Georgia proposes to give this privilege to innumerable other committees—I do not know how many are enumerated in the amendment. Everybody can see the effect. Why, sir, one of the most convincing points made the other day by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in his argument against the alteration of these rules was that this privilege as already extended was so large as to make it impossible in some cases to enact legislation of the utmost importance; and he instanced bills coming from the Committee on Public Lands. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY]. He says that the extension of this privilege of reporting at any time, as proposed by me, would create infinite confusion. Why, sir, upon any of these reports when presented the question of consideration may be raised, and a majority of the House may refuse to consider them. I ask no more than that these committees in relation to important matters confided to their charge shall have the privilege of asking this House whether it will consider them—whether questions involving the organization of our diplomatic service, our Army, our Navy, and various important Departments of the Government shall have a hearing; that is all.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, of course it is important that these committees should have a hearing; it is important that every committee should have a hearing. The question to be determined in the wise discretion of this House is, Which of these committees should be specially privileged? The gentleman from Georgia proposes to give this privilege to so many committees that the value of the privilege would be annihilated. That is the difficulty.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Georgia is the only one presented which provides for bringing legislation here to be submitted to the will of this House. All the clamor here has been to the effect that the majority should rule upon all questions of legislation. The difficulty, it is claimed, has been that the majority could not rule, because the measures reported by its committees could not be brought before the House. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia provides simply for bringing these important measures before the House and letting the majority of the House determine what action shall be had in regard to them. If this rule prevails there can never be any such criticism justly made as has been made heretofore, that a majority of this body can not control its legislation.

So far as the other proposition is concerned, namely, whether one or more appropriation committees shall be constituted by this body, personally I care nothing. I regard it, however, as most pernicious that you divide the responsibility among several committees of the House to distribute the revenues of the country. I think, Mr. Speaker, we shall ascertain by experience we have made a departure which we ought not to have made. The experience of our own Congress for nearly a hundred years, the experience of the legislative bodies of nearly every State in the Union, and the experience of nearly all the civilized nations of the earth is against it.

Much has been said about the abuse of the power of the Committee on Appropriations. Why, sir, those supply bills must be passed in order that the Government may move along in its ordinary way. You can not bring forward one of those bills that you do not antagonize some other subject; the question is which shall be taken up, and the House has the power to determine whether it will consider the appropriation bill or some other subject. Usually the good judgment of the House prevails in favor of an appropriation bill because of the paramount necessity of passing it. And all this clamor about the abuse of the power exercised by that committee is uncalled-for, to say the least, of it, and scarcely any foundation in truth to justify it.

I was sorry to hear my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] who was the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-seventh, Congress come in here and confess to the country that he had held the appropriation bills of that committee in his own hands to force certain legislation through that House.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, he is at fault in his memory. Every single solitary bill that he referred to, together with certain other measures, was regarded by the party which he represented here on that committee as important legislation. It was their will—the will of the majority—that that committee should not antagonize that important legislation with any appropriation bill if it could possibly be avoided, and he simply obeyed the will of the majority. He tells us that he withheld these appropriation bills until away in July that the tariff-commission bill might pass, together with the little internal-revenue bill. Both of them had the right of way against any appropriation bill in this House. Besides, sir, the tariff-commission bill passed the House on the 6th day of May, and he could not have held these bills back away in July to let a bill pass which had already passed the 6th day of the previous May. The other bill, the internal-revenue bill, was reported to this House as early as March, more than four months before he reported his sundry civil appropriation bill, and that internal-revenue bill could have been passed at any time the committee in charge of it desired to bring it up if the House desired to pass it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] a question.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Did the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, hold the power in his hand to execute the wish of the caucus by holding those bills back?

Mr. RYAN. He never had the power as against the majority of the House. I wish to say that any chairman of any appropriations committee who would come into this House and say to this House and to the country, "I will not bring in the appropriation bills—the supply bills to keep this Government running—until you pass some specific legislation," would so offend the House, would so offend propriety, would so offend the country that he would merit and would possibly receive a prompt and severe rebuke.

It has always been in the power of the House to control its own matters. You do not propose to remedy any of these things of which you complain by any of the rules you have brought forward. You propose to clothe eight committees with the same power, with the same temptation and capacity to abuse it. You multiply eightfold the very evils of which you complain.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I may reply briefly to these criticisms which have been made upon me by my old colleagues of the Appropriations Committee. It may be that I arrogated to myself too much when I said I did it. I am willing that should be modified and changed and made to read that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] most ably seconded me in doing it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RYAN. And, you might add, every Republican member of the House at that time.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Put it that way—that the majority of the House seconded you.

Mr. HISCOCK. Put it, if you please, in that way, that the majority of the House aided me in doing it. I was backed by the Republican party in doing it. I admit that I was the organ of the Republican party in doing it. It was not done by my little hatchet alone. [Laughter.]

What I was discussing the other day was this—what I was illustrating was the power placed in one committee, either, if you please, through its chairman or any other accredited agent—illustrating its power for good or evil to control legislation and protract the session of the House. That was what I was intending to do, and I doubt if the country misunderstood me, and I doubt if any member on the floor misunderstood me. The question is not as to differences of opinion between members on the floor, but whether the power to coerce a minority, whether this vast power should be exercised anywhere by any committee. It was against that I was making my argument.

Perhaps too often when we are placed in prominent positions where we are the organ of our party we assume great consequence to ourselves. But the fact that the Appropriations Committee has had great power and assumed to itself to control and regulate the action of the House was what I was intending to illustrate and against which I was making my argument. That is all I wish to say in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kansas.

Now, that is all I wish to say in reference to the strictures of the gentleman, but I desire to add a single word now in reference to the particular proposition which has been presented by the gentlemen from Georgia and now pending. There is such a thing as making confusion worse confounded on this floor. There is such a thing as putting it into the power of a minority to prevent action on the part of a majority. You can carry the rule too far in your attempt to give a majority power. I say, then, if you adopt the amendment to the rules proposed by the gentleman from Georgia its logical effect will be to enable a minority on this floor to constantly exhaust the time of the House by questions of consideration, by raising questions whether this bill or that or the other shall receive consideration first. Between these committees your whole time will be exhausted by questions of consideration. Now, we did not believe that it was right or that it would facilitate the public business to extend these committees and their privileges with reference to the passage of appropriation bills.

But we have done this, we have put into the rules a provision for a morning hour for the consideration of business from committees, and have provided that if their business is not finished in that hour it goes upon the Calendar as unfinished business, and as unfinished business is entitled to consideration whenever you go to the Calendar appertaining to that particular class of business. I say to all gentlemen of the House that so far as any theory can be formulated in these rules for facilitating the business of the House in my judgment you can not improve upon that which has been reported here by the majority of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, seated immediately in my front is the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the last Congress, and I invite his attention particularly to what I am going to say. In response to the gentleman from Georgia, if I did not mistake his remarks, he said that upon a question of consideration in the Forty-fifth Congress the Public Lands Committee had been voted down. I wish to state in response to that, upon the responsibility of my own recollection as well as upon the recollection of one other member of the Committee on the Public Lands, that that committee never was voted down in that Congress except by the Appropriations Committee. I do not want the idea to go to the country that the Democratic party with 80 majority on this floor had taken the position that it would consider other matters of legislation in preference to the forfeiture of unearned land grants.

A word now in response to the gentleman from Georgia upon his amendment. These rules, as reported by the committee, propose the creation of five additional privileged committees. The amendment of my friend from Georgia contemplates the creation of five more committees. If, then, the proposition of my friend from Georgia shall be adopted, you simply increase the number of those committees to ten, with equal powers and right of way, and all these committees are to go before the Committee on the Public Lands.

Sir, I hope the Democratic party in this House with its 40 majority will not embark in any legislation through amendments of the rules or otherwise which will degrade the Public Lands Committee; certainly not at least as long as the question of the forfeiture of the public lands is a live question before the people of this country. But it has been said that this is another way by which you can elevate these committees which have in charge subjects of important legislation of which the gentleman from Georgia speaks. My opinion is, after some two years' experience on this floor, that the way to accomplish that purpose is to take all general legislation away from the Appropriations Committee and force it upon the other committees on this floor, and then we can go to the Calendars, that ought in the transaction of our business here to be like the dockets of a court, and take up the business in regular order that may be upon them and dispose of it in accordance with the views of the majority of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, the pending paragraph is the Aaron rod of all this controversy. I shall support the majority report just as it is, and trust that its friends will keep their lines unbroken and adopt it as it came from the committee. I submit, sir, that there has been an infinite amount of irrelevant discussion introduced into the consideration of the question. Partisan politics, personalities, criminations and recriminations, all tending to inflame the passions and to prevent judicial impartiality. It might well be asked, "What business have they here at such an hour as this?"

Now, sir, the considerations that properly enter into the discussion of this question are these: Will the distribution of the powers of the Committee on Appropriations tend to salutary, intelligent, and economical legislation? Will it secure to this House its right for supremacy over legislation which it is called upon to enact? Why, sir, to state the propositions is to answer them. A committee appointed by the Speaker with reference to the aptitude and fitness of its members is presumed to be more competent to deal with the business of the department to which it pertains than any other committee. The physician who makes a diagnosis of a disease is more capable of prescribing for it than any amount of skill outside.

Take the Committee on Naval Affairs, for example. As I have said, it is appointed by the Speaker with direct reference to the aptitude of its members for that branch of the service. And will you tell me they are less competent to deal with the affairs of the Navy and to prescribe the amount that is needed to maintain it than any other committee, however able? And so with every other committee which has to deal with the affairs of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARKSDALE. I should like to be allowed a few minutes more.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the gentleman be permitted to continue his remarks for the time he has indicated.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKSDALE. To devolve upon the Committee on Appropriations the duty of reporting every appropriation bill is to impose upon it a task which it is not capable of performing satisfactorily. The result will be, as it has been heretofore, that bills will be reported at the close of the session, and members will be compelled to choose between the alternative of adopting items which they do not approve or of rejecting the whole, and thus forcing an extra session with all its attendant burdens upon the Treasury.

It has been well said that the House of Representatives is the great master body of the legislative department of the Government. Its Representatives come directly from the people. There are no middlemen between them and the real sovereigns of the land. The clause of the Constitution which devolves upon it the sole power of originating revenue bills attests the high mission to which it was appointed by the venerated framers of that instrument. It is the business of the Ways and Means Committee to provide the necessary revenue. It is the business of the House to disburse it wisely and economically for the maintenance of the Government. To vest this power in a single committee is to violate the true theory of the Government, and places upon the shoulders of this House an Old Man of the Sea to fetter its energies and obstruct it in the performance of its functions. I trust it will assert its rightful prerogative and throw off the incubus.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman does not yield me five minutes it is not worth while for me to take the floor.

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield the gentleman from Georgia five minutes before demanding the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not take up time in discussing whether the Committee on Public Lands or the Committee on Appropriations occupied the most time during the last session. The Committee on Appropriations did not take more than one-sixth of the time of this House, and conceding that the Committee on Public Lands occupied more time, that committee reported important legislation, and by reason of the privilege given them passed important bills through the last House, and for doing so it claimed and deserved great credit. But how were they able to do so? By the very proposition I now offer.

Mr. RYAN. It never was done before.

Mr. BLOUNT. It never was done before till the Committee on Public Lands got that privilege, and it did the country good service. I want to give other committees like powers, and I am ready if gentlemen in this House have important bills such as were presented in the last Congress—I am willing to give them an opportunity of having those bills considered. I would give this privilege so as to have the opportunity of having some of those great measures considered here rather than we should be left as we have been in prior Congresses. You have tried heretofore the method of leaving important legislation to go on appropriation bills and the result has been that the other committees have no privileges. You have forced this legislation on the Committee on Appropriations. They have taken jurisdiction because of the disposition of the House that they should exercise it, and the House has accepted the usurpation because it was in the line of their will.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. May I ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not understand you to intend by your amendment to double the number of privileged committees, but to extend certain privileges to certain committees.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is all I propose to do.

Mr. HENLEY. Does not that double the number of privileged committees?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understood the gentleman who preceded the gentleman from Georgia to intimate that this proposition looks to doubling the number of privileged committees.

Mr. ROGERS. That is precisely what it does.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not like to have all these gentlemen answering for me. I will read my proposition that the House may see what it is:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs shall have the same privileges in reporting and having considered bills in relation to organizing the State Department and the consular and diplomatic service as are accorded to the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means.

And so with the other committees. I designate specifically what they can do. I do not undertake to define generally what they may do. I select certain important measures that they may report and have considered by this House. And one of the reasons I have for inserting here the Committee on Foreign Affairs was because the consular service has not been reorganized since the Forty-third Congress. The condition of the commercial relations with foreign countries is such that the Secretary of State has seen fit to make special recommendations with reference to the reorganization of the consular and diplomatic service, and I want the Committee on Foreign Affairs to have the right to come here and submit its propositions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], which will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND. I call up now the amendment of which I gave notice, and which is printed on page 298 of the RECORD.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Amend Rule XI, paragraph 3, by disagreeing to the proposed amendments and then adding thereto so as to make the paragraph read as follows:

"3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government: to the Committee on Appropriations; but no general legislation shall be in order on any general appropriation bill nor as an amendment thereto; and no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditures not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Mr. HISCOCK. At what point does the gentleman propose this amendment shall come in?

The SPEAKER. In clause 3 of Rule XI, the same clause already under consideration. The gentleman's amendment in the form in which it has been read proposes to disagree to the amendments of the committee. It should really be to strike out those words and insert what has been read.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir; that is the proper form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] is entitled to the floor upon his amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the objection made to this proposition when presented before was that it was then out of place; that it anticipated something which the committee had disposed of at another point. The House has just consented to hear argument and to vote upon a proposition of my colleague [Mr. BLOUNT] about the right of way of several committees, although that question is treated in lines 232 to 243 inclusive of this report, we now being upon page 5. I take it, therefore, that the point as to this proposition not coming in at the right place will not now be urged. Having arrived at the Committee on Appropriations, we are now properly defining its jurisdiction. I therefore hope that those gentlemen who before urged no other objection to this proposition than that it was out of place will now recognize that it is offered in the right place and will vote for it.

I wish to correct what I have been told was too broad a statement made by me this morning when I said it was known that I was fighting this report. I stated distinctly when I made my first observations on this subject that I was not opposed to the report in any particular except the division of the Appropriations Committee. I did say that I wished to prevent "riders" on appropriation bills, but that I believed the report of the committee did not use apt words for that purpose. If you will look at the report of the committee on page 11, Rule XXI, you will observe that the provision reported forbids no rider except riders making appropriations. It does not forbid general legislation on appropriation bills at all. Under this rule as reported by the Committee on Rules you may on an appropriation bill organize a new court or change all the laws of the land, provided you make no appropriation therefor. Hence I have provided in the first clause of my amendment that there shall be no general legislation on any appropriation bill, either in the original report or by amendment thereto. I hope we shall now have a test as to the sentiment of the House on the subject of riders on appropriation bills.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the clause at the beginning of Rule XI:

All the proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rules, as follows.

That language is very broad, and it would include legislation of the kind to which the gentleman refers. I submit that the object of the gentleman's amendment is provided for in the report of the committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me explain. When a member proposes a bill it is referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the proposition; but the committee in reporting it may embrace in it any proposition they deem proper, unless there be a rule declaring they shall not do so.

Mr. HERBERT. The language "all proposed legislation" is broad enough to cover any proposition, whether it comes by way of bill or by way of a proposed amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then the report of the committee is utterly nugatory; for they have tried to make a restriction in this respect, although they have not gone far enough.

Mr. HERBERT. They have by the words I have quoted.

Mr. HAMMOND. Why then put in the twenty-first rule at all?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia by adding the words "and for such contingent expenses as may be necessary for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

This is a modification of the phraseology of the amendment proposed to Rule XXI by the committee. One word, Mr. Speaker, respecting the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, which I most heartily support. I believe in the principle involved in the amendment, which is that, first, we should take from the Appropriations Committee all power of legislation; and, secondly, we should keep from the legislative committees the power of appropriation. The wise practice of legislative bodies for centuries has shown that appropriation and legislation do not properly go together. The correct principle is to keep them apart. A committee charged with the preparation of legislation is not a proper committee to determine upon appropriations required by such legislation. There is a principle involved here which I think it is not safe to depart from. I therefore most heartily support the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, and simply offer this amendment because it seems to be agreed that the power must be left with the committee to report appropriations for contingencies not provided for by previous law.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, from the fact that the words "for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government" have had put upon them by previous constructions and decisions in this House an interpretation which I think the House does not want to carry into our new rules. I wish to call the attention of members to the proceedings of the House of Representatives of February 24, 1873, when General Butler, of Massachusetts, offered that celebrated amendment known as the "salary grab." I desire the Clerk to read the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on a point of order raised upon that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The history of the last clause of the rule, "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government," is this: Some twenty-five years ago, when the rule existed without that clause, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means offered an amendment increasing the compensation of custom-house officers. The point of order was raised that the amendment was not in conformity to existing laws, and that point of order was sustained. The next day the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means moved this additional clause as an amendment to the rule, and it was adopted by the House for the purpose of making it in order for him to move to increase the compensation of officers of customs. From that day till the present session of Congress the ruling under that rule has been uniform. Some seven years ago, while the present occupant of the chair happened to be in it in the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] raised the same point of order; and this same history of the rule was presented to the committee. The decision of the Chair at that time, corresponding with that which he now makes, was sustained by the Committee of the Whole.

The Chair is aware that upon two occasions during the present session the Committee of the Whole have overruled the Chair in making this decision. Since that, however, the Committee of the Whole has sustained the Chair in the same decision. The Chair has no doubt whatever that it is in conformity to the rules of the House. Therefore, so far as this amendment provides for increasing official compensation or salaries now fixed by law, the Chair rules it in order. From that decision the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] appeals.

Mr. BEATTY: I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to; there being ayes 33, noes not counted.

Mr. WILLARD: I desire to inquire of the Chair whether his ruling goes to the extent of affirming that a salary may be permanently increased by a provision of law. I supposed the ruling only went to this extent: that an appropriation for paying a salary for the next fiscal year could be increased.

The CHARIMAN: The Chair rules it is in order to fix an increase of salary; but he does not rule that it will not be within the power of Congress to diminish it. [Laughter]. Shall this decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 29.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add to the proposition as it now stands the following——

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending and an amendment to that amendment, and one must be disposed of before another can be received.

The question recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to oppose the amendment, and it is simply for the purpose of informing the House of the exact question as it is in my mind now before the House. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia it is to exclude the power of legislation on appropriation bills, and thereupon to include all appropriation bills in one committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. No; I do not. My real desire is to leave the appropriation bills where they are.

The SPEAKER. That is what the amendment does.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is my meaning.

Mr. HAMMOND. There are two propositions in mine. One is to strike out and one is to insert.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Georgia does not accept the theory of the dispersion of the appropriation bills, but that he couples with his motion that there shall be no dispersion a proposition that there shall be no legislation on appropriation bills?

agree that questions shall be made clear, and I have already sent in last night an amendment which I suppose will be considered when that part of the rules shall be reached. I believe a majority of the House is in favor of the distribution of the appropriation bills for reasons independent of considerations arising from riders on appropriation bills; but I also believe if the appropriations shall be distributed still a large majority of this House is in favor of any proposition keeping off legislation on appropriation bills; and therefore when we come to that part of the rules, even if appropriations shall be distributed, I shall then offer my amendment to cut off legislation from appropriation bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order on any general appropriation bill or be received as an amendment thereto, but provisions or amendments for the direct reduction of the number, salary, or compensation of officers and employés of the United States shall be in order on a general appropriation bill if germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word on that amendment. I think this subject is well understood by the House. I think the House is not inclined to favor legislation on appropriation bills, judging from the expressions of this amendment. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] has certainly guarded these bills from general legislation with great care. I trust the House will not object to the question of preventing some degree of retrenchment in the one possible form in which it can come before this House. I take it if you reduce offices and salaries it would be done on appropriation bills. I am willing to confine general legislation, so that I trust gentlemen around me will not misapprehend the fact that so far as any reform in the Government is to be brought about it must be brought about in this way.

Mr. MORRISON. Rule XI, under consideration, is the rule relating to the powers and duties of committees. As this report is presented the clause under consideration involves the question whether appropriation bills are to be distributed. So much of the clause as relates to the extent or manner of distribution has been read and is well understood. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, with the amendment proposed to it, couples together what in the report is kept apart—that is, the question of what committee shall have jurisdiction of appropriation bills and the question as to whether such committee shall not only have the power to appropriate money but also to incorporate new legislation into bills making appropriations required by law. In this report of the Committee on Rules these are presented as separate questions. One proposition is presented in Rule XI, and provides for the distribution of appropriation bills, and the other in Rule XXI, relating to or preventing legislation on appropriation bills.

The effect and purpose of the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia is to couple them all together, with the view of weakening (at least that is the purpose) the proposition to divide the appropriation bills. I trust it will be voted down, and that the appropriation bills will be distributed when we come to Rule XXI, in which this question is provided for in the old rules, and we will then decide whether we are to have new legislation on appropriation bills, and if so what it is, what its nature and character shall be.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I rise to favor the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] and to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. In this proposition, Mr. Speaker, is involved the whole question, and the real fight might just as well be had here as when we reach Rule XXI. In my judgment the chief trouble has been with the power of the Appropriations Committee to pass general legislation as riders upon their bills; and the immense power that that committee has had in this House is not acquired from the fact that they have twelve appropriation bills committed to their charge or five or ten appropriation bills committed to their charge, but comes from the fact that they can legislate upon their money bills, bills which are necessary for the running of the Government and without which the Government can not proceed; that they use these bills, the passage of which is indispensable to the conduct of public business, as a vehicle for general legislation.

Now, I think if you deprive the Committee on Appropriations of the power to legislate for this House by riders much of the evil complained of will be removed and we will have orderly procedure and promote the legislation of the country. The reason of the great importance of that committee in the past has been because every member of this House and every other committee of this House if they desire any legislation for the good of the country or for their constituents were driven to the Appropriations Committee as the only practical way to secure for their measures consideration and action. They were compelled to go to that committee and beg their favor because there was no way to appeal to the deliberate judgment of the House, and it is because that committee has had the power to legislate, not because it has the power to bring in all or a part of the appropriation bills, that has given them such weight and authority and tyranny in this House, preventing other committees from securing the consideration of the House upon important public measures committed to their charge. If you give to the Committee on Naval Affairs the right to come in here and propose all original legislation touching the Navy, the right to the Post-Office Committee to do the same covering post-office matters, the right to the Military Committee to bring in a bill concerning the military establishment or any changes thereto, and prevent the Appropriations Committee from proposing any new or original legislation—I say if you do that, then each of these committees will be restored to its proper dignity and its legitimate sphere.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman, if that is done, what will be the status and dignity and power of the other committees?

Mr. MCKINLEY. We have not been troubled at all in the past by them.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No, and they will not have power to trouble the House in the future if this is adopted.

Mr. MCKINLEY. We have now many committees that never have disturbed and never will disturb the House, and it is not proposed by this revision to give them any new power or clothe them with additional jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope they will not all be put in chancery on account of their modesty.

Mr. MCKINLEY. You hope they will not be put in chancery on account of their modesty! So do I. Why, if anything is referred to your committee, bring it in and change the rules of the House so as to have consideration for it; and I say that if you take from the Committee on Appropriations the power to legislate, then every committee having control of subjects-matter of legislation great or small submitted to them will be able to have a hearing in this House. To my mind that is the real objection and the most serious objection to our present rules. Speaking from a minority standpoint, I do not care, Mr. Speaker, how soon the present majority of this House shall change the rules or how soon it shall distribute the power of appropriation among the committees of the House, but they shall never have my vote to distribute them unless such distribution is necessary to rid us of what I regard as the most pernicious system in our code of rules to-day, the power to legislate upon appropriation bills. I do not sympathize with the sentiment so prevalent in certain quarters, notably among some of my own party friends, that because we are in the minority and the Democratic party are in the majority, that it is good policy for us, good policy for the Republicans, to help the majority to enact rules which everybody admits will lead to extravagance.

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no. Nobody admits it.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Nobody admits it? Why, it is admitted all over the House. The distinguished leader on your side of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], admits it.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Oh! he would admit it.

Mr. MCKINLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who for twenty years has occupied a conspicuous place on this floor, who has stood in the very forefront of Democracy, who knows his party and his party friends better than any other man in this country, who knows their tendencies and their purposes, comes here and appeals to us, the minority side of the House, to put on the brakes and help to keep his party friends out of the Treasury. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said the other day, and he said it feelingly, as an appeal to this side of the House, "Help! save them from themselves!"

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LONG took the floor, and by consent yielded his time to Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I can not resist that feeling appeal. I can not resist it coming as it does from such a source, for, I repeat, if there is a man in this country to-day who knows the desires and purposes of the Democratic party it is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], for he has been with them and of them, and when he says all this means extravagance I must believe him.

Mr. BINGHAM. He was with us in the last Congress.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Yes, and we were glad to have him with us. We were glad to have him help defeat the Morrison tariff bill. Is that the reason that gentlemen occupy the position they do on this side of the House? Is that to be the meaning of this vote? If it is, then let us vote down this proposition to distribute the bills; and I say to this side of the House if it is to punish the gentleman from Pennsylvania because he helped us defeat that bill it is hardly a sound reason.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no; that is not the reason.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I say if that is the reason, that he helped us to defeat that bill which would have destroyed the industries of this country, then I ask what is the position of the gentleman and those who are in accord with him?

Mr. BINGHAM. Our position is Judge KELLEY's position, and not that of his colleague [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. MCKINLEY. Judge KELLEY can speak for himself.

Mr. BINGHAM. He has done so.

Mr. MCKINLEY. We recognize him as our leader on the question of protection, one whom I have always gladly followed. But the gentleman shall not lead me away from the legitimate discussion of this question.

As I was saying a moment ago, the gentleman from Georgia, a gentleman in whom I have the highest confidence, who is always conservative and always conscientious, told us the other day that his party, now in the ascendant in the country, was on trial; that they had been kept from the knowledge of Governmental affairs and that they were necessarily green. And then he said he was afraid to try this experiment. I tell you it is wise, it is good statesmanship to help the gentlemen on that side to keep up the barriers, from the start. That is the part of a wise minority, to preserve the dam at the head of the stream lest you may not be able to erect it at the foot.

Mr. REED, of Maine (in his seat). Dam them altogether. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCKINLEY. My friend from Maine says "dam them altogether." I repeat his remark, so as to give him the benefit of it in the RECORD. [Laughter.] He has been trying to do that for six or eight years in the House but has not succeeded. The party still comes up smiling. [Applause.] My fellow-citizens [laughter]—I beg pardon, I thought from the applause I must be addressing my fellow-citizens. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another thing I want to say in this connection.

If the committee in the past having had charge of all these appropriation bills have acted as a check upon jobbery and upon waste and upon extravagant public expenditures, and all admit it has, in God's name we need that check now when the Democratic party has taken control of this Government. If we ever needed it we need it now against the wild projects and visionary schemes which will find advocates in this House. And especially do we need it, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the first official message of the President of the United States announces to this House and to the country the astounding fact that the estimated revenues of the next fiscal year are $24,000,000 short of the estimated expenditures for that year. The Lord knows, if economy was needed in the past it is needed now with a threatened deficit. Our surplus that we left you will disappear. We can not save that, but we can do our utmost to prevent a large deficit. [Applause].

[Here the hammer fell]

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. The form in which I drew the amendment in the printed proposition is to disagree to the proposed amendment of the committee and to add after that certain words. The Speaker suggested that the proposition should be to strike out and insert. I desire to ascertain whether after a proposition to strike out and insert, which is indivisible, shall be voted upon it will then be in order to strike out the words supplied by the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It will. The proposition now is to strike out certain words and add certain other words. The proposition merely to strike out would be a different proposition.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will ask a further question. To get a direct vote without coupling the two things together, may I not modify my suggested amendment at this time by an amendment merely to strike out, stating it is my purpose to follow that with the other proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will also withdraw his amendment for the present.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will do so.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I move to strike out the words supplied by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear that read. This, as I understand, presents the real test.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Strike out the words:

"As herein provided, viz: for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies."

So that it will read:

"3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government: to the Committee on Appropriations."

Mr. HAMMOND. This will leave the committees precisely as they are, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors having their bill, the Committee on Agriculture having their bill, and the Committee on Appropriations all the others.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Georgia. To accomplish what he has stated, and which I consider the real test, he had better retain these words, "except as hereinafter provided."

Mr. HAMMOND. I have no objection to that; but that gets us again into the trouble of striking out and inserting, which is an indivisible motion.

Mr. MORRISON. The amendment as now offered presents the question of the division of the appropriations, which is really the living question.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 55.

The SPEAKER. There having been no previous vote, the Chair is unable to determine whether the affirmative is sufficient to order the yeas and nays. Those opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise. [After beginning to count the negative vote.] Evidently more than one-fifth have voted in the affirmative, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the Chair state the question?

The SPEAKER. The amendment is to strike out that part of the report which provides for the distribution of the appropriations.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Those in favor of the distribution will vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The proposition will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana rises to ask a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it proposed to strike out the words "as herein provided?" I suggest that they ought not to be stricken out.

Mr. HAMMOND. The words proposed to be stricken out are the designation of particular bills.

Mr. MORRISON. The effect of which will be to leave all the appropriation bills with the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. Except the river and harbor bill and the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the proposition may be again read.

The Clerk again read the proposed amendment.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative, there being—yeas 70, nays 227, not voting 27; as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. HAMMOND was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VIELE. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. MULLER, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. GEDDES. My colleague, Mr. LE FEVRE, is unavoidably absent attending the funeral of a friend. He wished me to say that if present he would vote "no" on this proposition.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. My colleague, Mr. ARNOT, is sick and unable to be here. If present, he would vote "no."

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BOYLE with Mr. DINGLEY, on all political questions, and on this question until Tuesday next.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, with Mr. CRISP, on the question of the distribution of the appropriation bills as recommended by the Committee on Rules. Mr. STEWART would vote in the affirmative and Mr. CRISP in the negative.

Mr. HITT with Mr. PULITZER, on all political questions until December 22; also on Mr. MORRISON'S report to amend the rules. Mr. HITT would vote for the report; Mr. PULITZER against it.

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts, on questions of amendment to the rules reported by the Committee. Mr. BURLEIGH would vote for the report; Mr. STONE against it.

Mr. CRISP. By the announcement of the pairs I observe that I am paired with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. STEWART], and I therefore withdraw my vote. But the statement read from the Clerk's desk as to our respective votes is not what it was designed to be. The form of this vote is perhaps different from that anticipated by the gentleman from Vermont. He would vote "ay" upon the proposition to adopt the report of the Committee on Rules and I would vote "no." Therefore on the vote just taken his vote would have been "no," and mine, were I permitted to vote, would be "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HAMMOND. I now ask a vote upon the amendment proposed by me as printed on page 298 of the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to clause 3 these words:

"But no general legislation shall be in order on any general appropriation bill nor as an amendment thereto; and no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditures not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me we had better vote on this amendment when we reach that point in the report of the committee to which it is applicable.

Mr. HAMMOND. Very well. I have now no reason for pressing it at at this point. I desired a vote on the other proposition. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. HOUK. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph under consideration the words "for pensions." I offer this amendment with the view of submitting, when we reach clause 27, a proposition to give to the Committee on Invalid Pensions the right to report the pension appropriation bill. It strikes me that no committee can be so well prepared to perfect and report the appropriation bill on this subject as the committee that has gone through and digested all the legislation requiring such appropriation to be made.

This committee (and I will say, by way of parenthesis, the vote just taken clearly indicates it is the will of the House of Representatives to distribute the labor of this body and give to each committee all that comes within its proper sphere)—this Committee on Invalid Pensions has proved itself, I think, under the circumstances in the past a very careful committee. It enters upon no legislation and enacts no law until after it has examined into all its bearings and ascertains precisely what amount it will draw from the Treasury—how much money it will take to carry that law into execution. But it does seem to me if it is proper, and the House has just voted that it is, for the Military Committee to make up the appropriation bill for the War Department and the Post-Office Committee the bill for the Post-Office Department, that it is pre-eminently right for that committee, which has gone down into the groundwork of every enactment involving the question of invalid pensions, to make up the bill necessary to carry out the provisions which it has enacted or been instrumental in bringing before this House to be enacted by, as I conceive, having more knowledge than it is possible for the Appropriations Committee to acquire after the legislation has first been effected. They have to retrace—go over and look into every question which has been examined by the committee perfecting legislation on that subject. I will say that I make this speech gratuitously and make this motion in the same way, because I do not want or intend to be on that committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of force in the proposition that the pension bill stands by itself. That observation was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania or by my colleague from Indiana, and therefore it very properly may be taken from the Committee on Appropriations, rather than some others which are to be taken from that committee. But there is more force in the proposition that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has already more than it can possibly do. It is certainly the observation of this House that that committee, which had more than one-third or nearly one-third of the bills which were introduced into the last Congress, has as much as it can possibly do.

Besides that, the matter of appropriation bills is something which will suffer in the hands of one committee in this House, because the past shows that every single dollar which has been asked by the Commissioner of Pensions has been given by every Congress. So that there is no question about it. Besides that, with the overwhelming sentiment in the House in favor of doing away with general legislation on appropriation bills, there will be little to which the Invalid Pensions can ingraft in the way of legislation on appropriation bills. It would be of no value to pensioners, and therefore I think the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, a former colleague on the Committee of Pensions, ought not to prevail.

The question was taken, and Mr. HOUK'S amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to offer an amendment in the interest of economy. After the word "pensions," in line 108, add the words "the improvement of rivers and harbors."

Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is apparent, I think, to every gentleman in this House. I first desire by the amendment to place river and harbor appropriations among the general appropriation bills. The result will be that committee will not have the power to propose general legislation. It can not therefore, by a mere ruling of the Speaker, propose to turn dry land into a water way, and then appropriate money for its construction. In other words, in order that I may crystallize the point, I would not permit the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or any other committee of the House, to appropriate money for the construction of the Hennepin Canal until the representatives of the people determined that a Hennepin Canal should be made. I would remit the appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors to the condition of our public buildings bill. We do not allow the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to bring in a measure for the construction of a hundred independent public buildings and in the same measure propose to appropriate in a lump for them all. There is as much intimate relation between the Federal court-house in the city of Pittsburgh and the City Hall in the city of Washington as between the improvements of the Missouri River and the improvements in New York Harbor. If we desire to escape the enormous appropriations which have at times been proposed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and adopted by this House we will have to adopt some measure by which the Congress of the United States will resolve that the work shall be done before there shall be an appropriation made for its completion.

I remember when it was proposed to create the River and Harbor Commmission and send it out for the purpose of ascertaining what with propriety might be done toward the improvement of the Mississippi River and to propose to the Congress of the United States the plans upon which it might be done, I said then that the work of that commission, its propositions, its plans, the methods of its improvement, would never be submitted to the Congress of the United States to be adopted or repudiated by it. What is the result? They proposed to confine the waters of the Mississippi River within bounds by wire screens and willow branches and incorporated the proposition on an appropriation bill, and they have since that time proceeded year after year to squander millions of the people's money in an undertaking which has resulted in no permanent good to the commerce of the Mississippi River.

Give these to the Appropriations Committee; provide by the rules that that committee, as the House will provide, shall not have the power of general legislation, and put your river and harbor bill beside your public buildings, and before the Congress of the United States are called upon to pass an appropriation for the improvement of New York Harbor let it first resolve that it shall be according to plans and specifications that shall be submitted to it by the proper engineer department of the Government or a proper committee which may be organized for that purpose and from which it may receive a report.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment proposed by Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, it was rejected.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am astonished that there are so few economists in the House. How did my friend from the fourth district of Indiana vote? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to move an amendment to this clause, to strike out the words "and provide for deficiencies." I do not understand why the Committee on Rules should have given all deficiency bills to the principal Committee on Appropriations while the appropriations for the respective Departments are in subsequent provisions referred to separate committees. It seems to me that every committee should keep up its own deficiencies.

Now, the Committee on Military Affairs is, by a subsequent clause, which I think will be adopted by the House, as indicated by the last vote, given power to report appropriations for the support of the military arm of the Government, and if that committee should fail to supply enough funds for that purpose then the Committee on Appropriations is to take jurisdiction of the whole subject in order to know why the Committee on Military Affairs failed to supply a sufficient amount of money to run that branch of the subject. They must ascertain wherein that committee has failed to appropriate in whole or in part; it must look over the whole work of all of the other committees and see whether they have left out something that ought not to have been left out or put in something that ought not to have gone into the bill. I do not see much improvement in the work of the Committee on Appropriations.

My object in a revision of these rules was to relieve that committee from the burdens which had been imposed upon it. But this provision in this report requires them to go still further, and go over the work of these other committees and see whether deficiencies coming up from time to time are properly deficiencies or not. I do not see why we should make this committee do that work.

It seems to me it would be much more in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, if not in accordance with the report of this committee, if the deficiencies of every committee should be provided for by a report of the committee itself.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment of my colleague. I accept the significance of the vote which has been lately taken, not because I want to but because I have to. I still am of the same opinion that under the rules of this House heretofore, so to speak, we have had war and pestilence; and I say to gentlemen around me that by and by they will come to me and say before this Congress closes its session that the amendments to these rules have brought war, pestilence, and famine with them. [Laughter.]

Having stated that much, I want to say that I may be mistaken about this; each one must act according to his own opinion; but the vote just taken shows the fact that the Committee on Rules, with you at the head, Mr. Speaker, are to be sustained—and the vote was taken on the vital proposition—and that this report is to be adopted. While I will say that there is no argument in favor of the distribution of these bills in part that does not legitimately run to their distribution in full—public buildings and grounds appropriations to Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, deficiency estimates to be scattered among the appropriate committees, pension bills to that committee, and so on—yet I stand ready, Mr. Speaker, as this experiment is to be tried, in good faith to let, so far as my vote is concerned, its friends provide the details, and no one will be more gratified than myself, if the scheme shall prove a success.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You surrender, then?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I surrender because I am compelled to surrender. But I will say further to my friend from Pennsylvania, if perchance his constituents should call him to account for the vote given to-day he can come to me and I will give him a clean bill, because I believe he is mistaken and does not understand it. [Laughter.]

The question being taken upon Mr. SPRINGER'S amendment, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

8. To the improvement of rivers and harbors: to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors shall have the same privilege in reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, before me in the printed report what seems to be clause 8 ends with the word "harbor," the balance having a line drawn through it.

The SPEAKER. That is as the committee reports it to the House. It is recommended that that portion be stricken out.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to concur in the report of the committee by adding after the word "harbor" the words "except to make appropriations for the improvement thereof;" so that it will read:

To the improvement of rivers and harbors: to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, except to make appropriations for the improvement thereof.

Mr. MORRISON. That has just been voted down.

The amendment of Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. As I understand, the amendment offered by the committee is now pending.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WILLIS. Before it is voted upon I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it is intended by the provisions in lines 238 and 239 to give the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the same privilege as is given by the clause here proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. MORRISON. It does. It gets the same power in the section authorizing appropriations.

Mr. WILLIS. That is right.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The Clerk read sections 9 to 14.

The amendments proposed by the committee were agreed to nem. con.

The Clerk read the fifteenth section, as follows:

15. To the relations of the United States with the Indians and the Indian tribes, including appropriations therefor: to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 145, insert between the word "therefor" and the words "to the Committee on Indian Affairs" the words "also the consideration of Indian depredation claims."

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am aware that at the conclusion of the last paragraph of Rule XXI the amendment proposed by the committee makes this provision:

No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following-named committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and to the Committee on Accounts.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that some or most of the claims in relation to Indian depredations are not claims against the Government, and hence they would be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. There are other claims arising out of the Indian depredations which are not provided for by the treaties with the Indians, and these would be claims against the Government. My object is that the Committee on Indian Affairs shall consider and report on claims for Indian depredations, whether they be claims against the Indian fund provided by the treaties or claims against the Government. There are various tribes with whom there are no treaties providing for reclamations against them.

Mr. NELSON. If the object of this amendment is to give the Committee on Indian Affairs the authority to pass on depredation claims and report bills for their payment, I will say the committee has already that power. If it is the design of this amendment to allow the incorporation of depredation claims in a general appropriation bill, that power ought not to be given to the committee. It is a dangerous power, and the Committee on Indian Affairs ought not to be permitted to bring in any claim in the nature of a depredation claim or any private claim into a general appropriation bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. That is not the object. As the rule now is, claims arising from Indian depredations are referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but appropriations for them are not incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill. The object of this amendment is, that the Committee on Indian Affairs shall consider and report upon the propriety or impropriety of paying these Indian depredation claims that are provided for by treaty between the Indians and the Government and report them separately. And there are claims which are not provided for by treaty but which arise from depredations by Indians which would be just claims against the Government; and the object of my amendment is that the committee may consider both those provided for by treaty and those not provided for, but not that they shall put them on appropriation bills.

Mr. NELSON. I say again, if I understand the gentleman from Texas correctly, this amendment ought not to be adopted. The Committee on Indian Affairs already has the general power to investigate and report by bill all these claims. It has that general power, and that power is ample and sufficient. If anything more is intended by this amendment in addition to that, such additional power should not be granted and this amendment should be voted down.

I say this from the experience I have had in the last two years on that committee, that one of the greatest dangers it encounters is from the host of depredation claims, and no power should be given to the committee to report those claims beyond the power it already has.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The gentleman from Minnesota does not understand the object of my amendment. As I have already stated, there are claims arising against the Government for depredations by the Indians that these rules would exclude from that committee. There is a portion of those claims which is left in the hands of the committee as provided by this proposition; but there are other claims which would be excluded by the amended rules and would be referred to the Committee on Claims. And any man who knows the great number of claims before that committee knows that these claims for Indian depredations never could be reached by it.

Mr. LAIRD. The district I have the honor to represent was a few years ago on the frontier, and there is a large number of claims in the hands of citizens who suffered depredations from the savages. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Texas its object is to confer on the Committee on Indian Affairs the power to adjust these claims and to report appropriations for them where they do not affect anything except the annuities coming to these Indian tribes and does not involve an appropriation of money de novo from the Treasury. Is that the idea?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir; but it goes further. There are certain claims for depredations by Indians not provided for by treaty, and the rule as proposed to be amended seeks to take the consideration of these claims from the Committee on Indian Affairs and to give it to the Committee on Claims. I think sound judgment requires that all these claims arising from depredations by Indians against the tribal funds or against the Government should be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LAIRD. I certainly agree with the gentleman from Texas. The amendment ought to prevail. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I am ready for the vote.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 30, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee on Rules has proposed no further amendment to Rule XI until the forty-ninth clause is reached. Unless some gentleman desires to offer an amendment to the other portions of the rule the Chair will direct the Clerk to read clause 49.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules propose to amend clause 49 by inserting, before the word "appropriations," the words "having jurisdiction of;" and by inserting, after the words "general appropriation bills," the words "the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors;" so as to make the clause read as follows:

"The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz: the Committee on Elections, on the right of a member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the committees having jurisdiction of appropriations, the general appropriation bills; the Committee on Rivers and Harbor, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors; the Committee on Enrolled Bills, enrolled bills; the Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses; and the Committee on Accounts, on all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to amend by inserting in this paragraph, between lines 243 and 244, these words:

Any commission authorized by law to report by bill to the House shall have leave to report such bill at any time, and may call the same up for consideration as provided in the fifth clause of Rule XXIV.

This amendment, I believe, has the approval of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let us understand the amendment.

The SPEAKER. There are two commissions authorized by law to report by bill to this Congress. This amendment will give those commissions the privilege of reporting their bills at any time and of calling up their reports in the morning hour.

Mr. MORRISON. Without such a provision those committees would have, under the rules, no opportunity to report.

The SPEAKER. They are not called as committees.

Mr. REAGAN. What are the commissions?

The SPEAKER. There is one on ordnance and one on the geological and geodetic surveys.

The amendment of Mr. HERBERT was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "harbor," in line 232, the words "Committee on Public Lands, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I think members will at once see the importance of this amendment, which simply embodies what was a special rule of the House in the last Congress. This question of the public lands is perhaps one of the most important upon which we are called to legislate, and it is becoming more important every year. Under this amendment, as will be observed, the Committee on Public Lands will have the right to report at any time bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad or other corporations—meaning, of course, where such grants have not been properly earned under the law. It provides, further, for the reporting of bills which look to the protection of the public domain and its reservation for actual bona fide settlers. Every one familiar with our public land system is aware of the depredations and frauds committed by parties who seek to procure the public lands for speculative purposes instead of for homesteads. Our public lands are steadily and rapidly diminishing in area. It therefore becomes important, I submit, that the Committee on the Public Lands, to which these questions of great public magnitude are referred, should have right of way in this House for their legislative measures.

I will not take up time by going into details with reference to the manner in which our public domain is being despoiled. It is not necessary for me to discuss now the land-grant question and the importance of Congress taking up that question and determining what lands now unjustly held by railroads as against settlers should be forfeited. Every member here understands as well as I the importance of these matters. I trust, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HENLEY. I want to draw the attention of this House to the fact before we come to a vote on the proposed amendment, that the Forty-eighth Congress almost unanimously adopted a rule offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] embodying this identical proposition—that is, making bills forfeiting unearned land grants to railways bills of a privileged character. I wish also to draw the attention of the House to this other still more important fact, that since the adoption of that rule by the last House two national conventions have assembled and with all conceivable solemnity pledged themselves this thing should be done. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, to vote in opposition to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Indiana I conceive would be nothing less than infidelity to those pledges.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state that in the propositions I submitted to the House, and which were referred to the Committee on Rules, there was one which substantially made this precise addition to the rules. I am glad that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] the former chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has renewed his proposition as an amendment to the rules, and I hope that the Committee on Rules will not regard such amendments as being in antagonism to the proposition which they have reported, but will allow the House to assist them in making what must be considered as valuable additions. This certainly is one, and, as the gentleman from Indiana has stated, it is in accordance with the vote cast by the House in the last session of Congress with unprecedented unanimity, and which gave the Committee on Public Lands the same privilege which this amendment proposes to give it. It is in accordance with the pledges of our party to the people and in accordance with the vote of the Democratic majority in this House in the last Congress when we gave this committee the same power. I hope there will be a departure from the uniform proceeding heretofore made upon amendments, so that this provision may be allowed to go into the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I trust the motion will be adopted. I think there will be no more important subjects before Congress than those embodied in the proposition of my colleague, that the Committee on Public Lands should have the right and privilege of the most favored committees to report and have considered bills for the purpose which he has indicated, to protect the public domain and reclaim the forfeited grants. It is a subject growing more important every hour as your great public domain disappears in vested estates. I call the attention of the House to the fact that at the opening of the last Congress the proposition giving this committee these powers was adopted I believe with only 6 assenting votes on a yea-and-nay vote. The subject is more urgent now than then. I again repeat that I hope the proposition will be adopted. The highest public interests demand it.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, if we commence by giving this privilege of report or special right to all, or so many, of these committees, they will all be privileged, all be placed upon an equal footing, and we will then never get to the end of anything. We shall then be as if none were privileged. When this proposition was presented in the last Congress as a separate proposition or privilege I voted for it. I shall vote for it again, and have no doubt a large majority of the House now as then will vote for it when it comes before us for consideration as a separate measure, and therefore I insist it shall not be allowed to go into this report as a part of a permanent code of rules.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] may be satisfied with the government of this country by the Committee on Appropriations—so may the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentlemen from New Jersey and from New York. There are some reasons for this not found in the exalted patriotism and intelligence of those gentlemen. One is the head and others members of that committee. In judging of the weight which should be given to the opinions of these gentlemen, it is just to consider their relation to the money appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations. While the center of population of the United States has passed a thousand miles westward from the Atlantic coast, the center of appropriations and expenditures of public money will be found on a line drawn from this Capitol through the city of Philadelphia to Boston by way of New York.

To my mind the despotism of the Committee on Appropriations, as constituted in the last Congress, is in keeping with the domination which the East has exercised over the West, since there has been a West. The East has colonized the West, and Eastern men in the West have kept alive a prejudice for the East, which has colored Western thought and action for generations. The representatives of the West come here to find the important places on the committees that shape the legislation of the nation, filled by men of the East, and they are forced to pay tribute even in the passage of laws to the domination of the older States. Admitting that the East is mother to the West, is it not time that we declared, not a sectional but a legislative, independence; time that we realized that we had reached our majority, and have a right to think and act for ourselves?

In no way can we more effectually do this than to break down the despotism of this committee, composed for the most part of men whose sectional sympathies are all against us, and some of whom are either ignorant, or, worse, indifferent to the development of the great West. It may be answered that this is a sectional view of the question. Possibly so; but is it not as defensible for a Western man in behalf of justice to the West to rebel against the tyranny of an Eastern committee, as it is for that committee, in behalf of Eastern ignorance (of the West), and self-interest, to continue to dwarf the powers of Congress and paralyze the development of the whole country? We are moving on; you are standing still. You are developed; we are developing; you are cautious, conservative; we audacious, progressive; and from the reciprocal action and reaction of the forces we represent must and will come the harmony of good laws.

Thus far in the progress of the debate the Committee on Appropriations stands charged with the failure to give the country a navy, and provide fortifications for the Atlantic frontier. An unpatriotic omission truly, but still subject to the negative defense that the omission has not cost the country one dollar of treasure or one drop of human blood. Their failure to provide against prospective dangers by the construction of a navy and coast defenses, is an injury to our national pride which so far in no wise imperils the property or person of a single American citizen.

So much for the failure of this committee to permit national legislation looking to the protection of the East from prospective danger. How has the West fared at their hands? In the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona a war of extermination has raged since the adjournment of the last Congress, and continues to-day. Geronimo and his band of Chiricahua Apaches, breaking from the San Carlos agency in May last, have murdered over an hundred defenseless settlers and destroyed hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property and driven millions from investment in that region of unexampled mineral richness.

The unchecked outrages of this band of savages have struck a blow at the development of these Territories from which they will not recover in a half score of years. Unless this Congress wishes to see a commentary upon this day's work written in the blazing homes and murdered and mutilated bodies of the pioners of Arizona and New Mexico, let them take at least one bill from this committee and give it into the hands of some committee that has time to so consider and act upon the Indian question as to control these and all other Indians or kill them.

We of the West do not ask this in vengeance of the numberless outrages of which this section has been the victim—outrages as often chargeable to the ignorance or indifference of Congress as to the murderous savage. We ask it in the name of mercy to both the savage and the pioneer.

Let the government of these cut-throat Apaches be placed in the hands of a committee, a majority of whom shall be from the West or Southwest. Put no man on that committee from east of the Alleghany Mountains, unless he is in favor of the prosecution of these murderers of mothers and babes or is willing to see them colonized on Cape Cod or Beacon Hill.

We want this business in the hands of a committee who, from experience, will know enough to protect both the Indian and the white man; and the only protection of the white man lies in justice to the red man.

The cause of Indian wars in most cases comes not from the mismanagement or rascality of agents or the encroachments of border men, but from the lying contracts of the Government, miscalled treaties.

Whenever the agents of the United States, to secure the peaceable release of lands held by Indians and their removal to some reservation, commonly selected because no white man can live upon it, promises the Indian a home where game is plenty and, in addition to this, all the blankets he wants and all the provisions he can eat, the Indian has not learned that the written, and not the spoken word controls. He listens, believes, and is turned loose upon a gameless desert. His appeal for provisions is answered by the treaty which binds the Government in writing to give him one ration a week. He asks for more; the agent truthfully tells him he has no more. The Indian says, "But the Great Father promised me all I wanted to eat if I would come here." The agent tells him that it makes no difference what the Great Father said; he is not bound by that, but only by what was written—the treaty. Treaty, indeed! Treaty with children having the destructive powers of men, multiplied by centuries of savagery!

The Indian asks to leave the reservation to hunt for food, not for fun, and is told that if he does he violates the treaty and will be killed.

What answer is to be made to this being, fearless as the eagle, maddened with hunger, and stung to fury by deceit?

What answer, gentlemen of the East, gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee, you of the humane society, seated in the soft-cushioned seats of authority, defended by distance from the stealthy blow and brutal death?

Your answer is, let him work as others work! Ay, he does work; his tools are the knife, the hatchet, and the gun; his fields the homes of those who are the forerunners of a great nation's power, who, trusting to the parchment promises of protection to life and property, have gone out to find a road and blaze the way for civilization.

Let this business go into the hands of men who have time to think and feel; men who know enough to know that an Indian will fight before he will starve; men just enough to realize that if this Government takes from an Indian his lands and game, the implication is that it will give him in return food enough to eat and clothing for his nakedness. Let there be no more lying contracts. Let this Government make business-like agreements with the Indian and then keep them.

Let it be understood that the Indian can not live on the sympathy of humane societies. With him it is bread, or bloody reprisal upon all that comes in his way. Do not mix education with starvation. Feed him at the same time that you teach him. Give him the ration of a soldier, appropriate for him as you do for the Army, and then if he does not keep his contract of peace, kill him; and the conscience of all mankind will approve the act. See that the Indian is properly fed, then disarm and dismount him, and visit with punishment as if for murder any man who provides him with arms or horses. Give him a few cattle and sheep, a good range, and cupidity will civilize him.

Do this, and you take the menace of death from the pioneers of the West and give wings to the development of these Territories, destined, in my judgment, to outstrip Colorado and California in the race for wealth.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the Committee on Appropriations will meet this proposition with the answer that it is not economical:

Which is preferable, economy of human life or of money? As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] pregnantly remarked but a moment ago, "There is an economy that is criminal." If we can not save both, which shall we save, the dollar or the man?

The Committee on Appropriations last year scaled the estimates of the Indian Bureau $1,500,000 and upward. That bureau asked for nearly eight millions and got six millions.

The House will take notice that during this debate, in the face of the boast by the Committee on Appropriations, that the Departments had money enough, the proceedings were interrupted by the reading of a message from the President calling our attention to the dangerous deficiency in the appropriations for the support of the northern Cheyennes.

This is not the only instance of a failure of the supplies during the past year. In several cases, notably that of the Mescalero Apaches and the Southern Utes, supplies not provided for by existing law have been furnished to prevent hostile outbreaks.

The Territories are practically helpless here; they have no vote in this Congress. Any failure on our part to deal fairly and generously with them is obnoxious to that principle of natural justice which commands us to protect the weak.

Any economy, falsely so called, which turns loose the western savage upon the western settler is a disgrace to this House and an outrage upon American civilization.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] argues danger to the country from the distribution of the appropriation bills to seven committees, because since the Committee on Agriculture was empowered to report appropriations for the Department of Agriculture the appropriations for that Department have increased. The appropriations for that Department have increased since 1880. So have all the appropriations for all the Departments of the Government. The appropriations in the gentleman's own State and in that of the other great economist from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have increased also. The gentlemen do not complain of the increase that comes home to them! Is it the idea of the gentlemen that the public money expended west of the Mississippi River is wasted and that spent east is saved?

Is it patriotic to spend millions on public buildings in Pennsylvania and criminal to expend a little more than half a million on agriculture in the West?

We submit, Mr. Speaker, that the test is not whether the appropriations for agriculture have increased, but whether they ought to have increased. Never before the year 1885 have the appropriations for agriculture equaled or exceeded $500,000, and those of 1885 would not have equaled that sum but for the creation of the Bureau of Animal Industry, which took $150,000 of the appropriation in 1885 for the Agricultural Department, and $100,000 of that appropriation in 1886.

The average annual appropriations for the Agricultural Department from its creation to 1880 were $84,634.37 per year, and the total expenditure from its creation to that year amounted to $3,216,114.37. There was appropriated for the support of the military and naval establishment of this Government in 1877 the sum of $50,117,824. The appropriation for agriculture in the same year was $174,686. That is, there was appropriated for defense in a time of profound peace two hundred and eighty-six times as much as there was for production. I do not say that this was too large an appropriation for national defense, but I do say it was infinitely too small an appropriation for agriculture.

The census of 1880 shows that, practically, one-half of the population of the United States live by agriculture, and the new contribution which they annually add makes possible the material prosperity of the whole country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] complains of the increase of agricultural apporpriations. I invite not only his but the attention of this House to the amounts appropriated in aid of agriculture in that same year, 1877, by other governments.

Austria and Hungary	$5,495,125
France, for agriculture and commerce	20,534,410
Prussia	2,612,340
Italy, for agriculture and commerce	2,715,995
Russia, for agriculture and public lands	14,826,184
Great Britain	795,590
Sweden	651,737
United States (as before stated)	174,686

The Kingdom of Sweden, with twenty-one times less area and less than one-twelfth the population of the United States, appropriates more than three times as much toward the promotion of her agricultural industries than does this country; and this, too, with an area scarcely half as large as the State of Texas, and a population less than the State of New York.

Mr. Speaker, there is one item in the appropriation complained of that I wish to refer to briefly; that is the item of $250,000 for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, having for its object the protection of domestic animals from contagious diseases. The gentleman [Mr. RANDALL] says this is a wasteful appropriation.

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars too much?

Alas, Mr. Speaker, had the Forty-eighth Congress had the courage and intelligence to have appropriated at least four times as much for this purpose it would have resulted in the saving of millions.

Does the gentleman recall the German, French, and (practically) English embargo on American meats? The several States of the Union might better have appropriated and expended a million dollars each than have suffered the loss which has fallen upon this country since 1880 in this one item alone.

Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania realize that disease has cost a loss (direct and indirect) which scales $100,000,000 during that period?

The losses to my own State (Nebraska) in the last year from contagious diseases of swine alone amount to $2,445,778.

The United States has 40,000,000 head of horned cattle; Great Britain has 7,000,000 head. With her 7,000,000 head of horned cattle that country has sustained an annual loss of $6,000,000 per year from pleuro-pneumonia in her herds. If that disease gets rooted in this country we may look forward to an annual loss of from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000, and this disease when once disseminated can not be stamped out except by the destruction of the herds. Pleuro-pneumonia has already appeared in nearly half the States of the Union, and as it can not be successfully grappled with by the States, owing to their limited jurisdiction, it must be controlled, if controlled at all, by the General Government through Congress.

The value of the herds of horned cattle of the United States is given at $1,200,000,000, and when the gentleman from Pennsylvania remembers that this amount represents the present earnings and possible future profits of one-half the population of this country he will hesitate to complain of the paltry appropriation of $250,000 expended in defense of this vast property from the encroachments of disease. The gentleman is never tired of asking Congress to protect the labor of his great State from the ruinous competition of the pauper-paid labor of Europe.

We have been patriotic enough to stand by him, believing it to be American to even suffer some in our individual interests rather than to become an obstacle to the prosperity of our wage-working countrymen of the East. You ask us to protect your labor against poor pay. We ask you to protect our property against destruction. For twenty-five years we have answered that we would protect you. Can you now afford to answer that you will not protect us? The question is so plain that the wayfaring man, though from Pennsylvania, can no more afford to say no, than the wayfaring man, though a fool, can afford to say there is no God.

Hon. H. G. Davis said in his place in the Senate of the United States, in January, 1881:

From the time of the landing at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock the American farmers have always constituted the advance guard and the largest part of that grand army of progress and liberty which, in its triumphant march in the face of dangers, trials, privations, and the cruelty of the savage, has gradually subdued forests, crossed rivers, and climbed mountains, until civilization, society, churches, schools, and happy homes have been established from ocean to ocean and from the lakes to the Gulf.

The American farmers have laid the foundations of an empire on this continent destined largely through their efforts, virtues, industry, courage, and devotion to free government to surpass in substantial glory, grandeur, wealth, progress, and prosperity all the nations of this world and the achievements of history.

Our liberties were conquered and our Constitution made mainly by farmers, and to them, in any and every great crisis, we must look for the safe-keeping and protection of both. As a rule the agricultural classes have always been devoted to liberty, peace, and good order, and the friends of established society and the enemies of disorder, wrong, change, violence, and unjust revolution; they constitute the reserve forces of conservatism in all governments, particularly in ours.

The collection of large populations in commercial centers, by depleting the country, has a dangerous tendency. It is in the cities and these great centers that rings, strikes, frauds, trades unions, centralization, and consolidation are born, fostered, and best flourish, while in the agricultural districts the tendency is in the opposite direction.

General Jackson, in his fourth annual message to Congress (December, 1832), says:

The wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of the population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are everywhere the basis of society and the true friends of liberty.

Washington, in a letter to Sir John Sinclair, said:

I know of no pursuit in which more real and important service can be rendered to any country than by improving its agriculture and its breed of useful animals.

Washington, in his eighth message to Congress, said:

It is not to be doubted that, with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population, and other circumstances of maturity, this truth becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse; and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety?

Mr. Speaker, in the light of the wisdom of the Father of his Country, and the strength of one of its grandest defenders, Andrew Jackson, is it not safe to say that upon the protection and elevation of agriculture, and its accompanying productive industries depends, to a great extent, not only the prosperity of the country but the stability of the Government itself? The most prosperous nations of the earth foster agriculture by appropriations of money from the public treasury, and find it a paying investment.

The time has come when the intelligent producers of this country should demand at the hands of their representatives the substantial recognition of the fact that the productive industries form the basis of national wealth, and that this fact be recognized by extending to them fostering care, support, and protection commensurate with their importance.

Mr. Speaker, there is another question of great moment to the country which I have the honor to represent and to the country west of the Missouri River, and for that matter to the entire country. On the 3d of April, 1885, the Commissioner of the General Land Office issued the following order:

SUSPENSION OF ENTRIES.

Final action in this office upon all entries of the public lands, except private cash entries, and such scrip locations as are not dependent upon acts of settlement and cultivation, is suspended in the following localities, namely:

All west of the first guide meridian west in Kansas. All west of range 17 west in Nebraska. The whole of Colorado except land in late Ute reservation. All of Dakota, Idaho, Utah, Washington, New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming, and Nevada, and that portion of Minnesota north of the indemnity limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad and east of the indemnity limits of Saint Paul, Minneapolis, and Manitoba Railroad.

In addition, final action in this office will be suspended upon all timber entries under the act of June 3, 1878; also upon all cases of desert-land entries.

W. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

APRIL 3, 1885.

As appears by the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the number of pre-emption entries made during the year was 47,946, which he says would cover 7,671,360 acres of land. The number of homestead entries made during the year is placed at 50,877, embracing an area of 7,415,885 acres. The number of pre-emption entries unacted upon under the operation of the foregoing order at the close of the fiscal year was 32,374, and the number of homestead entries unacted on was 28,811—making a total of settlers' claims unacted on of 61,185, which would represent 9,789,600 acres of land.

The Commissioner states that final proof was made in 22,066 of the 50,877 homestead entries, but does not state that patents issued in any of such cases. It is fair, therefore, to presume that no patents have issued to any of the 22,066 homesteaders who have made final proof. This would give 3,530,560 acres to add to the 9,789,600, making a total of 13,320,160 acres of homestead and pre-emption land suspended.

To any one conversant with the land laws of the United States, it is known that any homesteader or pre-emptor of the public lands, having complied with the laws as to settlement and improvement of the tract taken by him, can make final proof on the same at the expiration of six months, and on the payment of the minimum or double minimum price, as the case may be, receive a final receipt for the land, which final receipt, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the decisions of the State supreme courts, has always been treated as absolute title, and would be treated so now but for this order, which operates as an impeachment of title, as well as an impeachment of the good faith of the 84,251 settlers making the settlements and proof thereof.

As the report of the Commissioner relates to the 30th of June, 1885, all of the persons who had made entries by that time would now be entitled to make final proof and receive their final receipts for these lands, if they could show, as most can, compliance with the law as to settlement and improvement. This would make the number of homestead and pre-emption settlers on the public domain of the United States now entitled to patent, or to claim patent, as shown by the report, 84,251—that is, 84,251 persons, heads of families, representing at a fair estimate a population of 252,753 persons, under the ordinary operations of the law entitled prima facie to an absolute title to 13,320,160 acres of land, and now deprived of their rights by the order cited.

But for this order the Government would have received from the sale of these lands to these settlers the sum of $16,650,200; this being at the minimum rate of $1.25 per acre for the 13,320,160 acres of land "hung up" under the order, and the settlers would under fair circumstances have been able to procure credit on these same lands of from $16,650,200 to $23,310,280 over and above the sum paid to the Government. This sum if so raised by mortgage of the lands is necessary and would be used by the settler in making life on the claim possible during the winter and providing seed for the spring planting.

In the face of this order the settlers can not, so far as my knowledge goes, raise a cent on their lands. In this connection I beg to submit as a part of my remarks a letter addressed to myself, written on the 15th of this month from a constituent 1,600 miles away; the writer is an intelligent man, located in the heart of the agricultural district in Nebraska, which is affected.

DEAR SIR: The actions and rulings of Commissioner Sparks in regard to the issuing of patents as affecting deeding and mortgaging land on final receipts will almost depopulate Southwest Nebraska unless it is reversed.

The idea of prohibiting people from obtaining money enough to live on while they are trying to improve this "Great American Desert" appears to me most ridiculous. The effect of the whole matter will be to force the homesteaders to sell their claims for whatever they can get and leave the country and go back to the densely populated East; and of course the lands will fall into the hands of the cattle syndicates.

It would look very much like this was the intention of the Commissioner "to a man up a tree;" but the more charitable view to take of the case is that Commissioner Sparks has never lived, with a wife and half dozen ragged children, in a sod house for four or five years trying to prove up on a homestead, and knows but little of the effect of his rulings.

Sincerely yours,

———.

The order in question, it will be noticed, applies to all lands west of the first guide meridian west, in Kansas, and all west of range 17 west in Nebraska. An examination of any map of those States will show that the suspension affects fully one-half of the area of each of those States named. More than this, the order, it will be observed, operates to withdraw from settlement all the lands in the United States available for settlement in the States and Territories west, southwest, and northwest. All the lands owned by the Government now being sought for settlement by the people, except those in the south, are practically unavailable to the people wanting homes.

It must be borne in mind that millionaires do not migrate to Nebraska, Kansas, or Colorado. The people that go there go much as the first settlers came to the colonies in the old time. They bring neither gold nor silver. They are without resources; their only property is their willingness to work. Their wealth is in the future. They are surrounded by no splendor except that of hope. They are sustained alone by the faith of things not seen.

In the light of the extraordinary consequences of evil to the present and future of the States and Territories affected by this order, it becomes pertinent to inquire upon what authority of law and what warrant of fact this wholesale slaughter of the rights of 252,753 citizens of this country is based? The authority of law is raised by construction, by implication, and that is raised by what is called evidence furnished by the published report of eighteen special agents who are relied upon to impeach the sworn evidence of 83,251 claimants and 166,502 disinterested witnesses, and who must have sworn for them, and in addition to this the official finding of the trusted local land officers of the Government.

Some of the evidence (reports) of the special agents would seem to commend itself to the ridicule of all reasonable men by statements of this kind:

I give it as my opinion that in Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota the proportion is 90 per cent. to 10 per cent. of bona fide and possibly successful cultivators.

Here the gentleman is speaking of timber-culture claims, and, on the strength of this opinion of a man hired to hunt down these settlers of the frontier, an order issues suspending not only timber-culture patents, but all patents. When before, with the approval of civilized men, was the opinion of an informer taken as ground for the suspension of the due course of law? No one from the West, that region which has suffered most from the aggressions of the landed corporations, but will sympathize with the Commissioner in his effort to protect the public domain from the encroachments of the corporations of all kinds, whether cattle kings, so called, or railroads.

We do not object to the suspension of timber-culture entries or to the suspension of any entry of whatever kind whenever a specific charge of fraud is made against that entry. We do protest against a cloud being cast upon the honest claims of settlers on the agricultural lands of Nebraska and other States and Territories by the dust raised by eighteen spies whose official heads hang upon the slender thread of the caprice of an administration mad with reform, and a Department which believes itself laboring with a mountain of fraud, which seems to breathe an atmosphere of suspicion, and which appears more than willing to see in the sweat-stained face of the Western settler a masked and contemptible scoundrel, intent on robbing the people of their great patrimony, the public land.

Does not this Congress understand that in Nebraska, where every hundred and sixty acres of agricultural land is worth from $500 to $1,000 as soon as patented, and where there are from five to twenty claimants for every claim; where every man has the right to contest any entry, fraud upon the public domain is an impossibility? Does it not occur to the honorable Commissioner that he is doing in these States and Territories, where the land is valuable for agriculture, the very thing that the land-grabbers and thieves want done?

This order makes it impossible for an honest settler to raise a dollar on his final receipt; failing in this he must abandon the land, or stay on it and starve. The result is plain, he is compelled to sell, to sacrifice for almost nothing what has cost him the torture of long toil to get; his claim is "gobbled" by the land shark, the cattle syndicates, and he is sacrificed to a special agent who rides through the region of "suspected lands" in a palace-car and writes lurid reports of crimes and shames that smack of the sensational, that ought no more to be received as evidence of the character of the homesteaders than the illustrations in the Police Gazette ought to be received as evidence of the fireside morality of New York.

Mr. Speaker, these men are poor—good proof they are not rascals. They are not prepared for a siege, much less can they withstand for years the fire of all the official batteries. They have some rights as human beings; they are not wholesale liars. Men do not commit perjury by the hundred thousand.

This order covers half a continent. Men do not sin by the continent—they do not attempt to take an empire by perjury. Men are not punished geographically, or condemned by the million without their day in court. The reasonable doubt which saves the wretch trembling for his life, "the presumption of innocence" which guards us all, speaks for these men and demands that the heel of the Department of the Interior be taken from the neck of these settlers.

Let the power which has been too long trusted with the Committee on Appropriations be taken from them and given to a committee which will take the time to see and know for itself before it will permit a great Department of this Government to be prostituted through imposition on the one hand or credulity on the other into an engine of oppression. Give the power of this Department into the hands of a committee who will remember that the presumptions of law do not change with a change of administration.

Mr. HISCOCK. The objection to the adoption of the amendment, it seems to me, is this, that the more committees to which we give the right of way the more confusion we will have on the floor. One will be antagonizing the business of another, and we will use up an immense amount of time in voting which shall have the right of way.

I undertake to say that the Committee on Public Lands will in this as it did in the last Congress meet with no successful opposition to having all the time assigned to it which it may want for this purpose. It has been the uniform practice to give them that time whenever they wanted it.

In the rule as we have it, in the morning hour they can report their bills, and when they are up for consideration, if at the end of that hour they shall be unfinished they can go upon the Calendar of unfinished business. And it seems to me if they have that right with other committees it is all they can ask for, when we know the practice has been in the past, as no doubt it will be in the future, to give them such time as they may desire for the consideration of their business.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I rise for the purpose of moving an amendment to Rule XI by inserting the following as clause 50——

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me offer a verbal amendment before the amendment of the gentleman from Maine is taken up.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have no objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend by inserting in line 239, after the word "harbors," the words "including appropriations therefor." In every other place where there is a provision for an appropriation bill the words "including appropriations therefor" is inserted in the rule. Their omission at this place might mislead, and so by the insertion of the words I have indicated it will be provided that it is not only the purpose to empower the committee to provide for the improvement of rivers and harbors, but also to make the appropriations therefor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the construction placed upon these words as they stand in another rule of the House has always been that they apply to appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understand that; but it can do no harm, as we are now preparing a code of rules, to put those words in, lest some chairman hereafter in construing the rules shall deem that there exists ground for another construction.

The SPEAKER. The clause of the rule which gave the right of consideration under the old rule uses this exact language.

Mr. HAMMOND. But that was when it had other words in connection with it which have subsequently been stricken out.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken. The construction has always been that it conferred the right of appropriation.

Mr. HAMMOND. If there is no special occasion for it I shall withdraw the amendment in order to save time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before passing to another subject I wish to offer an amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert by adding to line 243 the following:

"The committees having authority to report appropriations, and other committees having jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof, may at any time after the morning hour report bills involving but not making appropriations the provisions of which shall retrench expenditures."

Mr. SPRINGER. The object of that amendment is to enable the Committee on Appropriations, which are now to be deprived of the privilege of incorporating general legislation upon appropriation bills, to bring their economical legislation into the House as a privileged matter in another shape, so that we can put provisions for the retrenchment of expenditures in one bill and money propositions in another and take them together to the Senate, so that we may still have the privilege, which has heretofore been enjoyed by the House, of legislating in the interest of economy whenever the majority of the House desires to do so.

We will not be permitted to place them upon appropriation bills hereafter, and I hope that another avenue will be opened quite as broad and quite as good and convenient, so that we can legislate hereafter in the interest of economy.

The question being taken, the amendment proposed by Mr. SPRINGER was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I now call up the amendment which I have sent to the desk to be inserted as an additional clause, to be known as clause 50 of Rule XI.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the committee having jurisdiction of the general appropriation bills on or before the 1st day of March in the long or on or before the 1st day of February in the short session of Congress to report the general appropriation bills.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a word in explanation of my purpose in introducing this amendment. I suppose that every member of this House has, among a thousand others, two purposes in view: one to have an opportunity to call up such legislation as he believes to be necessary; and another, the opportunity to understand the legislation upon what he is voting. Now, I will not discuss the question of the use that has been made by the Committee on Appropriations of its power in the past. That has been all pretty well gone over. My friend upon my right [Mr McKINLEY], whom I do not now see in his seat, stated a short time ago that one of the greatest abuses was the power in the hands of the Appropriations Committee to legislate. That I acknowledge. But, Mr. Speaker, one of its other great abuses is its power to obstruct legislation by withholding the bills upon appropriations to the end of the session, and then use them as a club to knock out the propositions and measures of every other committee that may come up before the House or the country demands the passage of. I desire, sir, that there shall be some time in the session, some period when these appropriation bills shall have been passed, when we will have an opportunity of discussing other matters of legislation without the power on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, or any other committee that has the right of way in this House, of putting its garrote around our necks and choking us off.

There is another purpose in view, as I stated, and that is that the members of the House should have one opportunity to understand the legislation that we are called to vote upon. These supply bills are great bills; they are matters of great consequence. I do not think that the Committee on Appropriations in their discussions in the House have belittled their consequence in that respect. But it is a matter of great importance to every member of the House to be able to understand the bills before he votes upon them. But as a rule they do not come here until toward the close of the session—too late for consideration.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a suggestion? Will he accept an amendment to his proposition that they shall report the bills within thirty days after the general estimates are submitted to them?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have no objection to that. I only desire to fix some period when they shall come in.

But a word, sir, further. I ask gentlemen what opportunity did we have in the Forty-eighth Congress to understand these matters? Why, the sundry civil bill came into this House almost at the end of the session, so that there was not time even to read it. It was passed through the House under a suspension of the rules, just as a mother would make a boy shut his eyes and open his mouth to take physic, and nobody except God himself, and possibly the Committee on Appropriations, understood what on the green earth or in the heavens above was in that bill. Then we had afterward, in the vacation, ample time in which we could sit down and look over the bill and see what laws we had been passing in that hasty manner for the people of this country. I believe that every man in this House owes it to himself, owes it to his constituency, owes it to his country, that he should vote to give himself an opportunity to examine this important legislation before he is called upon to vote upon it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROCKWELL. This is the same proposition as was advanced yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who was on the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress. The gentleman from Massachusetts admits that last session we were bound hand and foot, that matters were so bad that only three classes of measures could be passed:

1. Insignificant bills;
2. Bills the overwhelming necessity for which could command a two-thirds vote; and
3. Bills passed by the grace of the Appropriations Committee.

He says relief is desired from this difficulty, and the claim is made that the needed relief comes from the additional changes proposed, namely:

1. A morning hour for committees;
2. By depriving the committee of the power of annexing general legislation on appropriation bills; and
3. Through this amendment.

I can not agree with this claim. The whole question divides itself into the idea of, first, the one-man power; and, secondly, the distribution of responsibility.

The difficulty with the present system is this: It gives power to the Committee on Appropriations to crowd out other business, no matter how important, and to practically make the House take up what the chairman of that committee prefers, for no one wishes to antagonize or vote down appropriation bills. They must be passed.

The real difficulty will not be met by leaving the present power with the committee. The practice has grown up, on one pretext and another, to hold the bills over until such time as the committee from the actual situation of affairs holds the power.

Two objections are made to the distribution of this power among the other existing committees: First, extravagance; second, the possibility of a combination of those committees being formed causing danger and delay. It is claimed that a divided responsibility will increase expenses; that the House in the Committee of the Whole, with the advice of these committees, can not "cut the garment to the cloth." The fallacy of this argument has been ably met by the gentleman from Michigan. This is a reflection upon the ability and good judgment of the House and the Representatives whom the people have chosen.

The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the combination of these committees will cause danger and delay is easily met. If there is danger from the combination of several committees, how much more danger and delay may arise when the power is lodged, as it now is, in one committee?

It is urged in defense that other committees have despotic power. The Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Rules are cited. The former may possibly report one bill to Congress in a session, but the Appropriations Committee has thirteen. That the Committee on Rules has great power and privileges is true, but it is also true that the duties of that committee have been so satisfactorily performed that nobody wishes to deprive them of that power.

However strong the arguments may seem, the real question at issue remains, Shall the majority dictate practical legislation, or by giving thirteen appropriation bills to one committee practically place in the power of that committee, under the rules, the control of legislation?

The country wants the House so to shape its rules that public matters shall as far as possible have a hearing and consideration. The report of the majority of the committee looks toward that end, and the recent vote indicates that such action will be taken. This course is conservative, and meets the approval of many of the best and most experienced parliamentarians.

The proposed amendment of the gentleman from Maine will not work practically and will not aid in the solution of the problem. These bills can not be prepared in the time he suggests, or if prepared would still lie over till late in the session.

The real difficulty now is not so much that the appropriation bills are reported late as that the power practically residing in the committee when they are reported is liable to misuse.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] whether he desires a vote to be taken on his amendment as it was read at the desk, or whether he accepts the modifications proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have no objection to accepting the modifications suggested by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANNON. I ask my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] before he insists upon the previous question to allow me two minutes, if the gentleman from Maine accepts that modification.

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield to my colleague for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The amendment as proposed to be modified will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XI by inserting the following:

"50. It shall be the duty of the committee having jurisdiction of general appropriation bills to report the same within thirty days after the estimates are received."

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say that with that modification gentlemen can see at once the foolishness of the proposed rule. It would either work great harm to the House, if enforced, or would stand a dead letter. The general estimates for most of these bills are now in the document-room, and have been ever since the commencement of the session, and your thirty days will have expired almost before the committees are announced. I undertake to say that it is absolutely impossible to do this thing. The deficiency bill, for example, can not be made up with any propriety in the long session before the 1st day of June or the 1st day of July, because you do not know what deficiencies have to be provided for.

Mr. MILLIKEN and Mr. BAYNE rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question.

Mr. LOWRY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his demand for a moment that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not want this proposition to be amended because I want the whole of it beaten.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on Mr. MILLIKEN'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. LOWRY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the committees having jurisdiction of appropriations shall report all general appropriation bills at the first session of Congress within sixty days and at the second session within forty days after the commencement of the respective sessions."

Mr. LOWRY. I have no disposition, especially in the present temper of the House, to enter upon any general discussion of this proposition, but I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] mainly lay, in my judgment, in the fact that it would have proven inoperative. Such has been the previous experience of this House, there having been in former Congresses a similar rule to that proposed by the gentleman from Maine.

By the terms of this proviso the exercise of the privilege of reporting at any time is made conditional on the committee having charge of general appropriation bills reporting in a given time. I am indifferent with reference to the period of time that shall be prescribed in the event of the House agreeing with me in the propriety of the adoption of this amendment; but it does appear to me the experience of the House is to the effect that it is extremely desirable the appropriation bills shall be reported at such a period of the session as shall afford sufficient time for their consideration. We all remember that some of the most important appropriation bills were reported at the very close of the last session of Congress. And it would be mere repetition on my part to refer to the fact that has been so often referred to here, that when those bills were acted upon by this House but a very small proportion in numbers of members of this body were cognizant of what was contained in the bills themselves.

I might cite by way of illustration some instances of the effect of reporting bills at that late period, but I will not extend the discussion. Either the entire membership of this House must see the desirability of having such a provision inserted in connection with this amendment or they must be satisfied that under the changes of the rules that have been already provided for the difficulty will no longer exist.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. LOWRY'S amendment, there were—ayes 10, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona;

A bill (S. 335) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River Flats in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, for printing the report of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes made at the Watertown arsenal and transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War.

THE RULES.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I desire to call up the amendment which I sent up last evening, and which is printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 239, after the word "harbors," insert the words "the Committee on Commerce, bills for the regulation of interstate commerce."

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, no committee, in my judgment, should have greater privilege to have speedily considered any bill that may be presented by it than the Committee on Commerce, such bills as have for their object the regulation of interstate commerce. There is no kind of legitimate business in the United States the prosperity, stability, and character of which would not be greatly improved and rest upon a more permanent basis if some honest, wholesome, and well-considered legislation could be had at the hands of the Congress of the United States regulating railroad transportation. Foreign commerce sinks into insignificance when compared with the interstate commerce carried on through the railroad system of the United States.

All our foreign commerce exports and imports amounts annually to only one thousand five hundred millions, while our internal commerce amounts to fifteen thousand millions of dollars.

We may build the Hennepin Canal and improve the navigable rivers and continue to make an annual expenditure of from fifteen to twenty million dollars a year for the benefit of commerce, yet it will remain a fact that nine-tenths of all commercial business will continue to be done by the railroads; and so long as the Congress of the United States, the only power that can regulate commerce between the States, shall delay action in this important matter so long will it continue to be a fact that a few of the great railroad managers of this country are exercising more power in levying and collecting taxes from the industries of this country than Congress and all the State Legislatures combined.

No regularity in these assessments, like assessments and taxes levied and collected according to law. Think of it—a power resting in the hands of a few men to say, at any time without notice or other condition save the will of the managers of the trunk lines, that charges for carrying a bushel of grain to the market shall be advanced 2, 3, or 5 cents per bushel, not because it costs or is worth more to carry the grain after than before the advance of rates, but because they can do these things arbitrarily and without notice and without reason, and sometimes because of capitalization of increased values, which means water, which water is, under what is known as good management, required to make the same return as the honest capital which has gone into the enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, at the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress the United States Senate appointed a committee to investigate the subject of interstate commerce and make report at the present session. I have not yet seen the report, but am in the possession of the answer of F. B. Thurber, of New York, to certain questions propounded by the committee, and as the answer of Mr. Thurber touching "the reasonableness of the rates now charged by such corporations for local and through traffic" is so comprehensive and shows so fully the system of overcapitalization whereby dividends are paid upon watered stock, which capitalization and the dividends are extorted fron honest industries—I say that the answer of Mr. Thurber is so comprehensive and yet so brief upon this and kindred subjects that I ask that the same be read and printed in the RECORD.

To the honorable the Select Committee of the United States Senate on Interstate Commerce:

Referring to the questions contained in your circular of April 10, the undersigned respectfully submits the following views bearing upon this subject, and as far as possible in the order of the subdivisions therein contained:

"1. As regards 'the best method of preventing the practice of extortion and unjust discrimination by corporations engaged in interstate commerce.'"

We need first a specific prohibition of practices generally admitted to be wrong, together with an executive to see that the laws are executed. Laws without a police force, or a police force without laws, are equally useless.

"2. As to 'the reasonableness of the rates now charged by such corporations for local and through traffic.'"

Rates as a whole on interstate traffic are now lower than ever before and in some cases unreasonably low, but in certain sections, and on certain kinds of traffic, rates are still excessive and unjust discriminations pervade the entire system.

In considering the subject, "What is a reasonable rate?" we are constantly brought face to face with perhaps the greatest difficulty and one of the greatest wrongs connected with the whole subject, namely, fictitious capitalization. Professional promoters have overloaded our railway system with watered stock, and have imposed upon the practical railway men of this country, who operate these great highways, the impossible task of earning dividends upon this mass of fictitious capital and at the same time satisfying the public. Having thus overcapitalized our transportation system they endeavored by combination to enforce rates which would yield dividends upon the entire mass of capital. This in turn has stimulated the building of parallel lines, which in many cases were not needed, and in times of commercial depression like the present their pools and combinations break down and they appeal to the national Government for legislation to enforce their agreements upon each other and enable them to tax the commerce of the country to sustain these fictitious values.

A good illustration of how excessive capitalization operates as a mortgage upon the industry of the country, and as a machinery for concentrating wealth in few hands wherever the power exists to impose rates for transportation which will yield dividends on watered stock, is found in the following table, showing what the dividends have amounted to (with interest compounded annually) on the $47,000,000 of watered stock put into the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad in 1867-'68 by the Vanderbilt management:

Watered stock issued in 1867 and 1868 by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, $47,000,000.

Dividend on this watered stock at 8 per cent. for the year 1869, $3,760,000 (1869).

Interest on 1869 dividend at 7 per cent., $263,000; with 1870 dividend, $3,760,000, $7,783,000 (1870).

Interest on $7,783,000 at 7 per cent., $544,000; with 1871 dividend, $3,760,000, $12,087,000 (1871).

Interest on $12,087,000 at 7 per cent., $846,000; with 1872 dividend, $3,760,000, $16,693,000 (1872).

Interest on $16,693,000, at 7 per cent., $1,168,000; with 1873 dividend, $3,760,000, $21,621,000 (1873).

Interest on $21,621,000 at 7 per cent., $1,513,000; with 1874 dividend, $3,760,000, $26,894,000 (1874).

Interest on $26,694,000 at 7 per cent., $1,882,000; with 1875 dividend, $3,760,000, $32,536,000 (1875).

Interest on $32,536,000 at 7 per cent., $2,277,000; with 1876 dividend, $3,760,000, $38,573,000 (1876).

Interest on $38,573,000 at 7 per cent., $2,700,000; with 1877 dividend, $3,760,000, $45,033,000 (1877).

Interest on $45,033,000 at 7 per cent., $3,152,000; with 1878 dividend, $3,760,000, $51,945,000 (1878).

Interest on $51,945,000 at 7 per cent., $3,666,000; with 1879 dividend, $3,760,000, $59,341,000 (1879).

Interest on $59,341,000 at 7 per cent., $4,153,000; with 1880 dividend, $3,760,000, $67,254,000 (1880).

Interest on $67,254,000 at 6 per cent., $4,035,000; with 1881 dividend, $3,760,000, $75,049,000 (1881).

Interest on $75,049,000 at 6 per cent., $4,502,000; with 1882 dividend, $3,760,000, $83,311,000 (1882).

Interest on $83,311,000 at 6 per cent., $4,998,000; with 1883 dividend, $3,760,000, $92,069,000 (1883).

Interest on $92,070,000 at 6 per cent., $5,524,000; with 1884 dividend, *$3,525,000, $101,118,000 (1884).

In other words, if the capital had been maintained at the amount then outstanding, and the rates for transportation had been reduced to a point which would only have yielded the same dividends upon the capital then existing (which, by he way, had been previously largely watered), the public would have been about $100,000,000 richer, and Mr. Vanderbilt and his associates $100,000,000 poorer, and this represents the results for but sixteen years and upon a single road.

It was, of course, claimed that this watering of stock was but a capitalization of increased values, but if this railroad had been owned by the State no such proceeding would have taken place, and Mr. Vanderbilt's own definition of the relations which should exist between the State and railroads (hereafter quoted from his communication to the Hepburn committee) shows the wrongfulness of such capitalization. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad furnishes a good illustration of a different policy. It has exacted enormous sums from the public in excess of liberal dividends, and employed them in extending and improving its road, but it has not capitalized this increase of value, and the estimated value of its "surplus" now exceeds $47,000,000. In other words, it has exacted from the public the capital necessary for an enormous extension of its lines, but it has had the decency not to capitalize this sum and make the people pay dividends upon their own capital thus exacted. Railroad men claim that rates bear no relation to capitalization. I admit that where they are governed by competition they do not, and this is why I so strenuously advocate holding fast to the sheet-anchor of competition, because without it the railroad companies would practically own the country. Indeed, it would be better than ownership, for with the machinery of Government invoked to sustain rates which would pay dividends upon a fictitious capitalization they would be able to tax most of the profit out of production and commerce without the trouble or responsibility of ownership.

*In 1884 the rate of dividend was reduced to 7½ per cent., which on the $47,000,000 of water amounts to but $3,525,000 instead of $3,760,000, which is the amount at the rate of 8 per cent.; and in 1885 the dividend, owing to the competition of the West Shore Railroad, has been still further reduced.

In view of this immense overcapitalization of our entire railroad system, we should consider with great caution any proposition which would confer the power upon existing railroad corporations to enforce rates which would yield satisfactory dividends to them, as it would necessarily impose corresponding burdens upon the industries of the country. Again, the cost of constructing railways has declined enormously in many respects, and it is hard to see why the owners of railroad property should be allowed to continue to make profits based upon the original cost of their property when owners of other property have to base their charges upon present values. This is illustrated by the following letter which appeared in the New York Tribune of March 3, 1885:

"RESTRICTION OF COMPETITION.

"To the editor of the Tribune:

"SIR: I see that your columns are open to the 'no competition' railroad people, and thinking you might be able to assist me, I present my case.

"I am the only retail dealer in drugs and medicines in this place, and have been in business for almost twenty years. I am a good citizen, keep sober, pay my taxes, and endeavor to support our little church in order that the cause of the Lord may spread and flourish. The stock of goods in my store has cost me about $20,000 (though I frankly admit it could to-day be replaced for less than $10,000). A few days ago a stranger came to our little town and looked around a while and then went away. To-day he returned, and I find he has bought a store and put in a stock of drugs (about $10,000 worth, and it is as good as mine, which cost $20,000), and openly announces that he will 'run me out.' Now what I want you to do is this: Present a bill to the Legislature and get them to restrict competition in regard to drug stores; and, please you, Mr. Editor, get the bill passed as soon as possible, for the welfare of myself and family and of the little church depends upon it. I think the action of that opponent of mine is an outrage on vested rights. (He is 'a common, miserable thief.' He doesn't pay as large a tax as I do, he has no family to support as I have, and, worst of all, he never goes to church.

"JONATHAN WIFFLETREE,
"Deacon in the Church.

"PUMPKINVILLE, N. Y., Feb. 26, 1885."

If our railroad system had not been thus overcapitalized it might, and probably would, be expedient to legalize pooling contracts and establish a system of maximum and minimum rates which would be fair alike to the public and to the railroads. No one can deny, or wishes to deny, the great benefits conferred upon the human race by the inventors who have given us these modern highways, but it is the inventors, and not the financial freebooters who have obtained control of them, that are entitled to our thanks. In sections where the law of competition does not work—and this is true of most local traffic, and of through traffic in large sections of our country—excessive and unequal charges have been arbitrarily levied, and the carrier, always an important factor in commerce, has absorbed the profits and substance alike of the producer, the shipper, and the consumer. Never in the history of the world have we seen such enormous accumulations of wealth suddenly acquired by any class as we have seen in this country during the last quarter of a century through the carrier thus taxing all other classes in the community. Within twenty-five years the Vanderbilt estate has grown from $5,000,000 to over $200,000,000. Within the same time the Central Pacific quartet have, it is estimated, extorted from the public more than $250,000,000. Twenty-five years ago Jay Gould was not rated even as a single millionaire. Within two years he exhibited to an admiring group of Wall street friends railroad securities estimated worth from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000, and it was announced that this was only a portion of his gains. The men connected with our transportation system who are rated at $10,000,000 and upward are too numerous to mention, and by far the greater portion of this has been accumulated within twenty years. Yet railroad men, when confronted with these facts, meet them with the assertion that rates are reasonable; that the transportation of this country is done cheaper than any other country in the world, and that a majority of all the railroads of the country are unremunerative to their owners. It is true that wherever water competition prevails rates are reasonable, and, fortunately for the people of the United States, a large portion of our country is thus favored. It is also true that, where excessive rates have unduly stimulated the building of competing lines of railroad, for a time excessive competition has resulted in unreasonably low rates, but this has usually been followed by combination, with an advance in rates to the other extreme.

This brings us to the consideration of question 3:

"Whether publicity of rates should by required by law; whether changes of rates without public notice should be prohibited, and the best method of securing uniformity and stability of rates."

I am of the opinion that publicity of rates should in all cases be required by law; that changes should not be permitted without reasonable public notice; and that these requirements would be the best methods of securing uniformity, if not stability, of rates. Both of these provisions were prominent features in the Reagan bill, but were opposed by the railroads as impracticable because it was alledged that they would give an undue advantage to Canadian lines, but, like most of the railroad arguments in dealing with the public, this was specious and misleading, for the reason that our railroads would still possess and exercise the same power over Canadian lines to prevent the cutting of rates which they now possess, namely, the fear of retaliation, which is constantly exercised by railroad lines in forcing competitors to observe an agreed schedule. Where one road cuts under an agreed schedule it is the custom of another road to at once reduce rates so low that the cutting road is forced sooner or later to restore and live up to the schedule of rates, and the American roads could hold this whip over their Canadian rivals as well after the passage of such a law as before, the only difference being that if five days' notice should be required of American roads before a change of rates they would be at a disadvantage for that period only.

"4. The advisability of establisiuhg a system of maximum and minimum rates for the transportation of interstate commerce."

I do not think that this is advisable or practicable at present. The various States within their borders can regulate their local rates in this manner with success, as has been shown by the experience of the State of Georgia. But, for the present, I do not think this necessary on interstate commerce. Our water lines, if properly sustained and developed, will do much to secure reasonable rates over a large extent of our territory; and if pooling combinations are prohibited there will be but little necessity for fixing a maximum, while in order to give railroads the remedy of retaliation mentioned in the previous section it would not be advisable to fix a minimum rate.

"5. The elements of cost, the conditions of business, and the other factors that should be considered in fixing the tariffs on interstate traffic."

This is answered by the discussion of the preceding section.

"6. Should any system of rebates and drawbacks be allowed; if so, should such transactions be regulated by law and subject to official inspection or approval, or should they be entirely prohibited?"

I believe that they should be entirely prohibited. Publicity of rates would be of little use if they could be nullified by secret agreements, and there would be no occasion for secret agreements if all railroads doing an interstate business were required to observe their public tariff of rates. Under present conditions I would leave railroads free to make any tariff they choose, with the qualification that their rates should be reasonable and public, and for substantially a like service the same to all. In the event of an unreasonable rate being charged, power should be lodged with a board of commissioners or elsewhere to, upon proper application, reduce said rate. Rebates are now the favorite form of discrimination and should be entirely prohibited.

"7. Should pooling contracts and agreements between railroads doing an interstate business be permitted, or should they be entirely prohibited by law? If they should be regulated by law, would it be sufficient to require the terms of such agreements to be made public and subject to official approval?"

I believe that pooling contracts should be entirely prohibited, but railroads would naturally agree upon the public tariff between common points. These tariffs might be made subject to the approval of a board of commissioners, as the French railroad tariffs are made subject to the approval of the minister of public works; but they should not be made legally binding, because in that case the freedom to make lower public rates, which is now a safeguard against extortion, would be abridged or abrogated. Railroad men now excuse pooling contracts by claiming that they prevent discrimination as between shippers; but this object would be reached by compelling railroads, under adequate penalties, to observe their public rates. This was well provided for in the Reagan bill.

"8. Should provision be made by law to secure to shippers the right to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shou d be transported?"

Unquestionably. This is one of the rights of the shipper which the carrier has arbitrarily overridden.

"9. By what method can a uniform system of rates for the transportation of passengers and freights by all corporations engaged in interstate commerce be best secured?"

By publicity of rates and holding all roads to a rigid observance of same as hereinbefore advocated.

"10. Should corporations engaged in interstate commerce be permitted to charge a lower proportionate rate for a long than for a short haul? Does the public interest require any legislation on that subject?"

I think that railroads should be permitted to charge a lower proportionate rate for a long than for a short haul, but that this should not be carried so far as to charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance in the same direction. Railroad men plausibly argue that where water competition exists they should be permitted to do this, but as in other matters there must be some principle of action established, and the occasional hardships which would be experienced under this rule should not be permitted to justify the serious evils which have heretofore existed from this cause. As for instance, where points in Utah and Nevada, 500 or 1,000 miles this side of San Francisco, were charged double the rates that were charged for hauling goods through to San Francisco. The theory upon which this was done was, they were charged the through rate to San Francisco and the local rate from San Francisco back to their destination, although in point of fact this work was not done, and there is no rule of law by which a common carrier can justly be permitted to do such things.

In the past it has been generally conceded that railroad companies ought to be allowed to charge as much more for the transportation of small shipments as it cost them more to transport such shipments compared with larger ones, but there is another view to this question which has great weight. A railroad is both a public highway and a common carrier, doing business by virtue of a public franchise, in granting which the vote of the small shipper was as potent as that of the large shipper, and therefore the right of a citizen on the highway comes in to limit the operation of the law of wholesale and retail which applies in private transactions. The railroads are performing a delegated function of the State, and, in my opinion, should be required to act toward shippers as the State would act. Upon this point the views of Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, of the New York Central, and Mr. Jewett, late president of the Erie road, as expressed in a letter to the Hepburn legislative committee, are important. They say (see testimony, volume 1, page 37):

"That it is the primary duty of the State to furnish 'highways,' whether they be the road, the canal, the turnpike, or the railroad, the State alone having the right of 'eminent domain.'

"That this duty has been complied with by the State in most of these ways.

"That, for prudential and other reasons, the State of New York preferred to engage the services and capital of her citizens to do what was her duty to do, granting them certain powers under certain limitations and restrictions, which are made part of the contract between these 'citizens' and the State.

"The State places such 'citizens' in her place to perform her duties, and for this purpose clothes them with the imperial right of 'eminent domain' so far as may be required to perform the duty devolv ing upon them.

"Such 'citizens' so placed have a right to the fullest protection of the State, and to be protected against any laws that the State would not pass if such property of 'citizens' had been built by the Stat e itself, and further, such 'citizens' should be protected against any legislation that would lessen the value of property so obtained by its 'citizens' by reason of their contract with and their willingness to take the place of the State in the performance of one of its highest duties.

"The railway company thus holds, in its relation to the State:

"First. Its position as a substitute for the State under the powers and limitations of the law; and "Second. The right of pecuniary recompense and of ample protection of property.

"The writers of the (citizens') address look upon the railway company as for pecuniary profit only, and ignore their position as created to perform the duty of the State, taking the risks of investments, of management, &c., upon themselves. The railroad companies thus have a higher claim than the ordinary corporation can have upon the State.

"The ordinary corporation is organized for the special pecuniary profit of its shareholders, the profit of the public being secondary. The railway corporation is organized primarily for the benefit of the people of the State, and the pecuniary consideration is secondary, but necessary to induce the citizens of the State to assume the performance of the duty of the State. This assertion is true, and is in the essence of the grant by the State of its powers."

The same gentlemen, in their testimony before the Hepburn committee, advocated that a car-load should be the unit beyond which no lower rate should be made, and Mr. Albert Fink, the pool commissioner, testified before the same committee as follows (see report, page 65):

"It is sometimes urged that railroad companies should grant lower rates on large shipments upon the same principle that wholesale merchants can sell cheaper than retail merchants. The same reasons why wholesale merchants can sell cheaper than retail merchants do not apply to the case of large or small shipments on railroads, when we have reference merely to car-load shipments. The cost of retailing merchandise is much greater than the cost of selling it in large quantities. It requires a different kind of an establishment, larger warehouses in comparison with the goods stored, more clerks, longer time to sell the same quantity of goods, slower returns, &c.

"In the case of shipments on railroads in less than car-loads, the cost will be greater than full car-load shipments—not always, but as a rule. Cars can not be fully loaded when a number of small shipments are made, which have to be unloaded at different stations. After unloading one shipment at an intermediate station the train has to proceed with the smaller load, but without reducing expenses in proportion. It is therefore proper that the shipper should pay the additional cost. There is good ground for discriminating between small and large shipments. But when shipments are made by the car-load, where it is merely a question of one or more car-loads, no additional cost is incurred by the railroad company.

"Whether these shipments are made by one or by many shippers, it costs the same. It costs no more to ship car-loads of freight between two stations of a railroad whether they belong to one shipper or to ten shippers, whether one man ship ten car-loads or ten men ship one car-load each. There is no ground for discriminating in favor of the large shipper. Any discrimination made in his favor is entirely arbitrary.

"There is no rule, no principle on which it can be established or defended. All arbitrary discrimination works injustice to others.

"Take a flour-mill producing ten car-loads of flour a day, and alongside of it at the same station a mill producing only a car-load. The railroad company decides that it give to the larger mill a rebate of 25 cents a barrel. This of itself constitutes a fair profit.

"The large mill can undersell the small mill in any market in which they are competitors. It can sell at cost and make 25 cents per barrel profit, when the other mill, if it wants to sell at all, must sell without any profit at all. This leads to breaking up of the small establishment, and the railroad company is the instrument through which it is accomplished.

"A common carrier has no right to make itself a party to such transactions. Moreover, it is not to its advantage to do so. This policy of discrimination prevents the employment of small capital, and prevents the building up by slow degrees the industries of the country. Only large capitalists can afford to carry on business, and they are not always to be found. From small beginnings, if properly fostered, large enterprises are built up. The larger manufacturers enjoy already sufficient advantages over the smaller. Being able to produce cheaper, they do not require the aid of railroad companies to still further discriminate in their favor."

Also at page 155 of the exhibits:

"The practice of making special contracts with some shippers—the larger shippers generally—at lower than regular rates, and charging the regular rates to all other shippers, constitutes one of the most unjust discriminations. It is practiced to a great extent. The rates of transportation between two points should be the same to all shippers.

"The payment of rebates, or drawbacks, by which means their unjust discriminations are practiced, should be forbidden."

It will be noticed that Mr. Fink advocates a distinction between car-load rates and those of smaller quantities, but in practice the west-bound pool for several years, while able to enforce its mandates, made no distinction between car-load shipments and smaller quantities. It is evident that it costs but little, if any, more for a car-load of freight composed of a dozen different shipments going to the same place than if composed of but one shipment, and the public certainly under such circumstances ought to have the benefit of the aggregate thus shipped. While it may seem just that parts of car-loads should pay more than full car-loads, yet the Government in transporting the mails carries a single letter for one citizen at the same rate it charges for carrying one thousand letters for another citizen. It is probable that if the State was the carrier, as suggested by Messrs. Vanderbilt and Jewett, the same rule would be observed, and the practice of the west-bound pool show that when it suits their convenience railroads can and do operate upon this principle. It is the departure from this principle which has built up most of the commercial monopolies in this country. The Standard Oil Company is a case in point, of which the Hepburn committee say in their report, page 42:

"Your committee were unable to ascertain the exact relations of these different organizations, owing to the refusal of several members of the Standard Oil Company subpœnaed as witnesses to obey the subpœna, and the refusal of those who did attend to answer our questions; but succeeded in establishing the fact that 90 or 95 per cent. of all the refiners of the country act in 'harmony' with the Standard Oil Company, and that they ship 95 per cent. of all the oil of the country; and, of course, the three and a half millions capital of the Standard is but an insignificant portion of the aggregate capital of this mysterious organization, whose business and transactions are of such a character that its members declined giving a history or description of it, lest their testimony be used to convict them of a crime. (See testimony of Messrs. Bostwick, Archbold, Rogers, &c)."

The great coal companies furnish similar illustrations. Our forefathers abolished the laws of primogeniture and entail in order to prevent the evil of large accumulation of wealth in few hands. As railroads have been operated in the past, they have been the most potent force to nullify this principle, which I believe to be a beneficial one, and which should be followed as far as possible. There should be no concessions allowed to large shippers, except such as represent the actual difference in expense in handling large shipments. Certainly no higher limit should be established than the unit of a car-load, as mentioned by Mr. Fink, and I believe that the welfare, both of the public and the railroads, would be ultimately subserved if rates were made uniform without regard to quantity. But if any concessions are made, there should be none beyond the car-load unit, and all such concessions should be as public as the rates themselves.

"12. Should corporations engaged in interstate commerce be required to adopt a uniform system of accounts?"

Within certain limits I believe they should, but that these limits should be prescribed by the commission hereinafter mentioned, and the same answer applies to question 13, as to annual reports to the Government, which should undoubtedly be required.

"14. In making provisions for securing cheap transportation, is it or is it not important that the Government should develop and maintain a system of water routes?"

It is of the greatest importance, and this is perhaps more forcibly illustrated by the following quotation from the report of the Hepburn committee:

"New York possesses the key to the situation in the Erie Canal. While the committee made no attempt to investigate the relation of the railroads to the canal, and sought to lessen their labors by avoiding this question, the canal, like Banquo's ghost, would not down; we were compelled to meet it at every point and turn of the investigation. The cost of water transportation from Chicago to New York is the base line upon which railroad rates are determined and fixed throughout the country. The rates, by agreement of the principal railroads of the country, from all points in the West to the seaboard, are made a certain percentage of the Chicago rate (testimony, pages 3001-3004). Thus Cincinnati is 87 per cent. of the Chicago rate; Saint Louis, 116 per cent.; Kansas City, 146 per cent.; Louisville, 96 per cent.; Cleveland, 73½ per cent., etc. There remains for the railroads to do this additional act of justice and see that the rates from points in the State of New York to the city of New York are made a proper percentage of the Chicago rate."

Mr. Blanchard (testimony, page 2840) says:

"The State holds within its grasp the great controller of the freight rate within its borders, to wit, the canal; there is not a town that is not affected more or less within this whole State, from the extreme northeast to the extreme southwest corner of it, by the canal policy and rates of this State."

"Mr. Fink, a recognized authority on railroad matters, testifies (testimony, page 530) that whenever a reduction is made in the rail rate from Chicago to New York, occasioned by lake and canal competition, that that reduction extends to Louisville, Nashville, and Savannah.

"It extends to every part of the country, I might say; to-day, when they charge 10 cents or 12 cents a hundred from Chicago to New York, the steamship lines from here to Savannah take up that freight and carry it for 15 cents from here to Savanvah, making a rate from Chicago to Savannah of 25 cents; the regular rate from Chicago to Savannch by railroads may be at the same time 50, 60, 70, or 80 cents; they have to come down and conform to the water rate; the rate in Savannah determines again the rate in Atlanta; Atlanta is perhaps the most interior of all towns in the country, and generally gets the highest rates on that account; they carry their freight for nothing, from Chicago to New York almost, and then from here by water to Savannah, and then carry the short distance from Savannah up to Atlanta themselves—that is 200 miles—and the other rail lines that work from Chicago to Nashville, Louisville, Chattanooga, and Atlanta, have simply to conform to the rates that the steamship lines and the rail lines from Chicago and New York make; thus the lake navigation and canal navigation regulate the rates of the whole country, you may say, from Canada down to the Gulf."

"Mr. Vanderbilt, in his testimony, attached equal importance to the canal and regarded it as an important factor in the commerce of the State and country.

"The maintenance of our trunk canal should engage the earnest solicitude of the State. Nothing could be more prejudicial to the interests of the city of New York, or the State as a whole, than to permit their efficiency to be impaired or their usefulness compromised."

The water lines are, I may say, the salvation of this country, and should be developed and extended in every possible way. While enormous improvements have been made in railroad transportation during the past twenty years, little or no improvements have been made in our system of American water ways. Steel rails, more powerful locomotives, improved freight cars which will carry two tons of paying freight for each ton of dead weight in rolling stock, as against the old rule of ton for ton; improved methods of handling freight, improved signals and labor-saving appliances in every department of railroad operation, have enormously reduced the cost of railroad transportation during the past two decades, while little or nothing has been done to improve our system of water ways. This is, doubtless, largely to be attributed to the adverse influence of railroad corporations in legislation. In Pennsylvania and other States they have bought up the canals and abolished them. Whenever a river and harbor bill is pending in Congress the railroad representatives will vote millions for improvements which do not materially affect them, but when it comes to an item like the Hennepin Canal, which promises to be of value in extending our system of water ways, the railroad representatives, whether Democrats or Republicans, are found voting solidly against it. Can there be any better illustration of the necessity for the people to insist upon the extension and improvement of our country's water ways? France has just entered upon the construction of a comprehensive system of canals designed to furnish water competition to the chief sections of that country. In England, where the canals have been largely bought up by the railways and dwarfed or closed, as has been done to some extent in this country, the principal commercial organizations are now advocating the re-establishment of the canals, on an improved basis, as a check upon railroad extortion. Our canals, connecting the great lakes with the ocean, which are really national highways, ought to be as much a recipient of the national bounty as the isolated trout streams, bayous, and petty harbors for which liberal appropriations are provided each year in the river and harbor bill. A comprehensive system of improving our principal water ways should be undertaken upon a scale which will enable steam, the great motive power of the world, to be advantageously used, and thus reduce the cost of water transportation in the same proportion that the same motor has reduced the cost of transportation on land. If France can expend $300,000,000 in constructing a system of canals, how much better can the United States afford to undertake the same work?

"15. In what manner can legislation for the regulation of interstate commerce be best enforced? Should a commission, or other State tribunal, be established to carry out the provisions of any law Congress may enact?"

Undoubtedly such a tribunal should be established. I can not better emphasize this than by the following extract from the report of the railroad commission of the State of Georgia for the year 1881, which says:

"Prior to the act of 1879 the common-law right of the citizen to be protected against extortion and unjust discrimination existed in its full force; but the remedy for its violation was wholly inadequate. Practically the citizen had no rights, though his theoretical right was ample and complete.

"The rights of the railroad companies were well defined enough, and their remedies also were adequate, being in their own hands. It was their capacity for abusing their powers which was not sufficiently held in check.

"The remedies of the citizen.—In the very nature of the case, the citizen stood at such a disadvantage that his rights were merely nominal. To illustrate: Suppose him to receive a package on which the actual freight charge was $1.50, while a just and reasonable rate would be but $1. What could he do? Usually he could not wait, but must pay the $1.50 under protest—and bring suit afterward, if he thought it worth his while for the half-dollar overcharge. But could he afford to do this? His interest in the matter would not warrant the expense—the costs, fees, witnesses, the discussion of the principles and facts involved, as to what rate would be reasonable and just in the particular case. And only the one case would be settled after all. The next day a parcel would be charged 75 cents, worth but 50, and the 25 cents would involve a new suit. Practically he was obliged to submit. Were it a merchant who overcharged him, he would transfer his trade to another house. But in dealing with the railroad he is dealing usually with a monopoly, unless at a competing point—and now even at such a point by reason of pooling—and so he was remediless. A litigation would usually settle but a single case—one class, one distance—scarcely any principle at all.

"Such was the attitude of the citizen. Consider next the attitude of the railroad prior to the act of 1879.

"It had a large interest in results. Instead of 50 cents multiplied by 1 (the citizens' interest), the railroad had 50 cents multiplied by 1,000 or 100,000 as its interest. It would have also ample experience, and the best legal talent already engaged and trained, and waiting, and all the experts favorably inclined.

"So unequally were the parties matched, that in the whole history of the State there has been (so far as we remember) not one single case of a suit by a citizen to enforce this common-law right—and but one to enforce even a statutory right for an overcharge. In that case the charter of the railroad, in express terms, limited the rates, yet the railroad fixed its rates beyond the chartered limit—printed them and collected them, and was checked by this suit.

"A remarkable commentary on the absolute worthlessness of rights without remedies.

"The consciousness of this huge disparity between the parties is the great reason why juries lean toward the weaker side. Notwithstanding all this, however—unless the sum involved was large, say a suit for life or limb or injury—the party aggrieved would not enter into so formidable a controversy, even with the sympathy of the jury in his favor.

"Indeed the case was not prepared for jury trial. As well turn a jury loose into a great pile of copartnership or bank books to strike a balance, as into the complex principles and facts involved in rates of freight without some report like that of a master in chancery as the basis of decision. Now all this has been in large measure remedied by the act of 1879, and adequate provision made also for such a report, so that the parties can stand on a level.

"JAMES M. SMITH,
"CAMPBELL WALLACE,
"SAMUEL BARNETT,
"Commissioners.
"R. A. BACON, Secretary."

Your committee will, I am sure, pardon me for the extensive quotations I have made from various authorities, and especially from the report of the Hepburn committee. This committee, appointed by the Legislature of New York in 1879, occupied nearly eight months in a thorough examination of the subject under consideration, taking some five thousand pages of testimony, and their report is generally acknowledged to be one of the ablest presentations of this difficult subject which has yet been placed before the public. While it was only instituted for the purpose of defining the relations between the railways of our own State and the public, the investigation necessarily took in much that applied to interstate commerce, which must be my excuse for quoting liberally from their report. After considering various defects in the general relations of railroads to the public the committee say (page 7):

"The mistake was in not providing proper safeguards to protect the public interest and hold the roads to a strict accountability for their transactions. Thus, through the laxity of our laws and the want of governmental control (measureably excusable, considering the unforeseen possibilities of railroad development at the time of the enactment of those laws, but no longer pardonable in the light of the evidence herewith submitted), have crept in those abuses hereafter mentioned, so glaring in their proportions as to savor of fiction rather than actual history."

After considering these abuses at length the committee say (page 69):

"Now, as to the necessity for some regulation to protect the public, see testimony of Mr. Rutter, pages 453-54, where he testifies that he serves the stockholders only, and only regards the public interest to make it tributary to the interests of the stockholders.

"Mr. Vilas (testimony, pages 414-15) testifies to the same controling motives.

"Mr. Blanchard, after describing a railway officer as subject to three practical tribunals—first, the president of the road; second, the law as laid down affecting transportation; and third, the unwritten law of commerce—says:

"'It has been our policy in this matter, while keeping within the statute law, as far as I knew it, or had occasion to know it, that wherever this public unwritten law came into contact with the interests of the shareholders, I believed it to be my conscientious duty to decide in favor of the shareholder; I knew of no claim that the non-shareholding interests had upon me as a railroad officer, so long as I was within the written law, to concede its views in the matter of rates and in the management of our traffic.'

"In the joint letter (testimony, page 47), Messrs. Vanderbilt & Jewett say:

"'That the managers of a railroad company desire to make all the money they can for their clients, and to do this they have constantly before them the question what rate within their chartered limits will an article bear that will yield the largest profit and at the same time stimulate its production.'

"The marked importance which is here attached to keeping within the law emphasizes the necessity for a law, for governmental control. The railroads have already confessed the necessity for regulation and supervision to protect them from the disastrous consequences of their own acts—acts of their own management.

"Mr. Blanchard tells us the pool will continue and will grow in extent and be respected, because roads are beginning to find out that they are better paid, by so doing they get better rates and make money. The possibility of combining practically under one management over 80,000 miles of railroad, with capital aggregating about $5,000,000, is certainly a strong reason why the Government should subject this vast interest to a proper regulation. The proposition that Congress should give to the pooling agreements the force of law, if practicable—which is doubtful—the people of this country, with the good reason they have to distrust the exercise of vast corporate power and the motives of some of the most potent railway kings, will never consent to; and this brings us to the embarrassing question of what shall be done."

On page 64 the report says:

"We have seen what gross infractions our railroads make upon the apparent rules of justice; and yet let the State propose to make a general rule or law and they immediately produce some remote exception, and insist that it argues the injustice and unwisdom of such a law."

On page 71 of their report the committee say (pages 71-77):

"RECOMMENDATIONS.

"The question we are called upon to consider is as broad as commerce, and commerce is king with the whole world for vassals. It has kept pace with progress and grown with civilization. It extends its blessings and its burdens alike to the remotest hamlet. The cost of transportation enters into what we eat and what we wear, that which preserves and nourishes our physical nature and that which administers to our spiritual. It enters into the necessities of life and is equally potent in determining our luxuries. Though it only affects certain industries and certain interests directly and perceptibly, its influence is equally potent in all the ramifications of society. The problem of transportation is an unsolved one, and from its very nature must ever remain so. Each generation must determine for itself. The constantly shifting conditions which surround it, the ever-changing elements that enter into it, the continual offerings which genius contributes to cheapen and facilitate transportation, present an ever-shifting phase to this kaleidoscopic question, calling for an ever-varying solution. The telegraph, the steel rail, the improved motor, the Atlantic cable, and kindred causes, have revolutionized and are continually revolutionizing commerce. The tariff of a dozen years ago seems extortion in the light of present charges. Called from various pursuits to consider this question, we were naturally embarrassed by its magnitude and the vital interests involved; and now, at the point of suggesting remedies for the wrongs proven to exist, remedies in themselves not difficult of suggestion, we are confronted with practical difficulties of a very embarrassing nature.

"The jurisdiction of this State is too limited. Proxies, watered stock, annual reports, and other matters within our State limits, are within our control and should be fully and properly regulated. The New York Central is the only road engaged in the carriage of freight to and from the West wholly within our jurisdiction. The Erie is a New York corporation, but runs through three States and has its eastern terminus in a foreign State. Even the port of New York, that contains the city of our pride and our solicitude, is not wholly within our control. The eastern borders of her harbor are marked by the coast of a foreign State. Thirty-four per cent. of New York's business is done by powerful rivals of our own roads that tap the granaries of the West by the shortest and most direct route. We might enact laws that would drive the business from our own roads without improving the condition of affairs in this State. Indeed, such a course would aggravate matters, for the interests of these rival roads center in rival cities.

"We might cripple the prosperity of New York; we might enact laws that would build up Jersey City and transfer the legitimate growth of New York to the Jersey coast. It is as imperative that such consequences be avoided as it is that present wrongs be redressed. While the laws of commerce ignore political divisions wholly, our jurisdiction is circumscribed by the limits of the State of New York.

"States divided by navigable waters, which are everybody's highway, present borders which the two systems of traffic must respect, and the breaking of bulk and terminal expense incidental thereto is unavoidable; but the artificial line of the surveyor, marking a political boundary, though it may determine where a man shall vote or pay his taxes, least of all lines has neither breadth nor thickness in determining the currents of trade. Whatever prominence may be attached to State individuality and State rights, in a commercial sense we are eminently a nation, and the sooner that fact is recognized the better it will be for our commerce. There is not the slightest reason why the Liverpool merchant should not buy his grain, graded, in Kansas City, by cable, and have it placed along side the dock at Liverpool with but one intermediate handling—the transfer from car to vessel at the seaboard. In the close competition of the present age transportation must be cheapened to that extent, and it were absurd to expect produce to be handled at New York for the sake of enabling those who handle it to make a profit. The point of production will seek the point of consumption by the cheapest and quickest route, and kings and parliaments are powerless to prevent. The complaint that New York makes as to the loss of jobbing trade, Chicago must make and Saint Louis also. Certainly, a percentage of the complaints lodged against railroads is due to the inexorable laws of trade. Congress, with power commensurate with our territorial limits, in conjoint action with the States, can regulate this matter. Under the Federal Constitution Congress may regulate interstate commerce, while the State only can regulate that within their borders.

"The complication of jurisdiction is emphasized by the peculiarities of our geographical position. The Baltimore and Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroads reach New York city by lighterage and ferry from the Jersey coast without anywhere coming within our jurisdiction. The Erie road has thirty-five points of actual contact and competition with other roads (testimony page 2845). Many of these points of contact are with roads leading to Philadelphia and Baltimore. The New York Central has nine points of actual contact with roads running or connecting through to Philadelphia and Baltimore. Many of these competing roads are foreign corporations, running but a few miles within this State, and, therefore, could be controlled by absolute law to but a limited extent.

"Rates ought not to be secret; but to go to the extreme urged by some, and compel the publication and posting of rates at all stations within this State, and prescribe a fixed period that all rates must be posted before they could go into effect, a rule that would be eminently just and proper could it be enforced generally throughout the country, would not only give notice to the public, but also to all competing roads. And at all points of contact—and there are many along the Erie and Central also—Pennsylvania and New Jersey roads could make their rates just enough lower to get the business and take it to Philadelphia or Baltimore or even to New York over their lines. For instance, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, in fixing a through rate from Oswego or Utica to New York, can comply with any requirement the Legislature may enact, until they get to the State line, and then, unrestricted as they are in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, could vary their rates so as all the while to place our own State roads at a disadvantage; this road, which is a Pennsylvania corporation, might publish its rates at all New York stations, and, for instance, charge 25 cents per 100 cwt. from Oswego to the State line and nothing from there to Jersey City. The line being a continuous one it would make no difference to its treasury whether the charge was located upon a portion of its line or the whole of it. The same may be said of the Northern Central running from Canandaigua to Baltimore, and the same of the Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia running from Buffalo to Philadelphia, and others. Our railroads should be forbidden to make secret rates and compelled to treat all shippers alike, but the propriety of compelling the publication of rates and the publication of all proposed changes is a matter for your serious consideration.

"Your committee made an earnest effort to ascertain the cost of transportation and the relation of the cost of through and local traffic. The best information that we could obtain does not enable us to suggest the enactment of any fixed ratio between State and extra State points, neither are we able to suggest the enactment of any fixed ratio between different points within this State. A thorough consideration of all the evidence adduced upon this subject, and of the subject itself, induces the conviction that the passage of what is popularly termed a pro rata freight law would be prejudicial to the interests of the public. The experience of Western States in this direction ought to be a warning and a satisfactory reason for declining to bring this subject into the field of legislation in this State. While there are certain general propositions that may with propriety be laid down by the Legislature for the control of traffic managers in the adjustment of rates, within whose general rules there must be permitted an elasticity of management and freedom to exercise judgment and discretion upon the ever varying questions that constantly present themselves for action, as a principle of railroad management, no more should be charged on small shipments than on large shipments proportionately than the additional cost of handling.

"A proper unit of shipment should be fixed. The practice of charging more for a short haul than for a long haul should be forbidden; the granting of unequal or preferential rates should be forbidden; the making of secret rates and the giving of drawbacks and rebates for such purpose should be forbidden; and your committee are of the opinion that the Legislature may safely go to this extent without infringing the proper discretion and elasticity of management which railroad managers must of necessity possess without driving the business from our own State roads to the rival roads of other States, without driving the commerce from our own cities to rival cities, and without in the slightest degree infringing or compromising the vested rights of railroad property. Your committee therefore accompany their report with proposed legislation designed to correct the above evils and the evils of the proxy system; designed to remove the defects in the law requiring an annual report to the State engineer and surveyor so that said report shall disclose a full and complete history of the year's transactions of the road, both financial and otherwise; designed to remove those provisions of law whereby it is possible to issue bonds convertible into stock, convert them into stock, and place the stock upon the market, all in one transaction, as was notably done during the Fisk and Gould administration of the Erie, and which may be done at any time for the purpose of obtaining or maintaining control of a road; amending the law passed in 1869, and still in force, which permits any two railroads upon consolidation to fix their capital stock at any amount, or, in other words, to infuse any amount of water into it; amending that provision of law which provides for issuing stock by railroads so as to give to the transaction publicity and require, preliminary thereto, the consent of the public through its proper officers; and designed to prevent discriminations upon like and contemporaneous shipments.

"The business of transportation requires the greatest freedom of management of any business extant. This is manifest to the most casual observer. The difficulty and the danger of imposing cast-iron regulations upon our railroads, especially in view of the fact that they would apply to our railroads only, leaving their competitors free and untrammeled, compel us to inquire what other means or instrumentality may be made effective in obtaining the redress which the public seek and to which they are entitled. Certainly, a railroad, in order to be successfully managed and prosperous in the whirlpool of competition of the present time, must be run by brains and not by legislation, and the reforms in railroad management must come through railroad managers by means of a public pressure brought to bear upon them. The claim given prominence by Mr. Depew, that railroads in guarding the interest of their stockholders will regulate themselves, would have more force were it not painfully apparent that railroads are not always run in the interest of the stockholders (and the interest of shippers must be considered). During recent years the management and the stockholding interest of the New York Central have been identical, and that road has been conducted with the best of economy and with exceptional ability, but according to Mr. Depew himself under prior managements the interests of the stockholders were disregarded in various ways. Boards of railroad directors frequently represent but a small share of the stockholding interest, and under the temptations which our railroad system holds out have in the past frequently consulted their own interests to the detriment of the trust which they represented.

"It seems to your committee that the wrongs that exist may be ameliorated, if not corrected, by introducing into the determination of these questions a public element which shall give to the public interest a consideration which the evidence shows it does not now receive; and to that end we recommend a commission, to be composed of three individuals, with power of investigation and recommendation.

"The claim recently put forth through the press by Mr. Vanderbilt, that, in case of a commission, the commission must either own the railroads or the railroads own it, presupposes an absolute hostility between the interest of the railroads and the public, which, in the judgment of this committee, does not or, at least, should not exist; and also a degree of venality on the part of public officials which a judicious executive will easily avoid. The prosperity of our State is inseparably connected with the prosperity of our railroads. And in contending for commercial supremacy and the control of the traffic of the West and Southwest, with their constantly growing power in questions of commerce and of government, public and railway interests will be identical and their efforts must be united. This emphasizes the necessity of immediately correcting the evils of railway management in this State, in order that all interests may be united.

"A commission, to be properly constituted, should, as does the English commission, give a representative to the railroads as well as to the public. One of the commissioners should be a man thoroughly familiar with the business of railroading, one of recognized ability and a recognized authority upon such questions; another should be a representative of the commercial interests of the city of New York, and another should represent the interests of the interior of the State; and one of the three should possess legal training.

"With a commission thus constituted, composed of men of recognized ability and unquestioned integrity, who should devote to this vast question their especial consideration and entire attention, it seems to us it would be alike profitable to the public and to the railroads. By means of their powers they could bring railroad management into the scrutiny of the public, and subject it to the influence of that most powerful of all motors for the correction of evil—public opinion. This will afford to the public a tribunal to whom they can appeal for a redress of grievances, easily and without expense; whereas now the only redress is to be had in a legal controversy with a powerful corporate interest. If wrongs should be practiced or attempted, the commission, by investigation, could bring them to light, and the restraining effect of possible or probable exposure of improper management would, in itself, be a powerful conservator of public interests. Commissions have been tried in many other States of the Union, and from their long continuance it is to be presumed that they have worked satisfactorily and beneficially there. While we easily foresee that an improperly constituted commission, composed of dishonest and incompetent men, would be alike a curse to the railroads and to the public, yet the necessity of enforcing a proper relation of these vast interests to the public and holding them to a proper accountability, and especially in view of our State government as at present constituted, your committee are of opinion that the example of other States and other countries in respect to a commission may with propriety and with profit be copied by us. Your committee have suggested remedies for the prominent evils discovered. The very limited time since our testimony was in print has not enabled us to review the whole field of legislation with the thoroughness desired, but the testimony submitted and the wisdom of the Legislature will suggest such remedies as we have omitted to specify."

While the foregoing recommendations were made as applying to the railroads of the State of New York, it will be observed that they embody the essential principles that should govern in interstate commerce, namely: first, publicity of rates; second, prohibition of preferential rates; third, prohibiting drawbacks and rebates; fourth, that no more should be charged on small shipments than the additional cost; fifth, that charging more for a short haul than for a long one should be forbidden: sixth, declining to legalize pooling; seventh, establishing a board of commissioners to see that these laws are enforced, and to investigate complaints and see that justice is done as between shippers and carriers. (I also believe that actions in the United States courts with penalties, as provided in the Reagan bill, are necessary in a country of such a vast area as ours.) The leading features of these recommendations were included in the bill known as the New York anti-discrimination, bill, which, however, was defeated in our Legislature by the money and influence of the railroads, combined with that of favored shippers. These were rallied and required by the railroad companies to appear at Albany and help defeat the bill; a special train was run and free transportation provided for this purpose; how they obeyed is shown by the following from the New York evening Post of that date:

"The power thus exerted upon the pending bill to prohibit unfair discriminations in freight charges may at any time be exerted upon legislation touching railroad interests. The railroads reach into every important center of population, and thousands of men may be precipitated upon the capital at a few hours' notice. One of the objections urged against establishing the State capital in New York city, when the subject was under discussion, was the danger of intimidation by a rabble populace. A similar means of influencing legislation is, it appears by to-day's experience, in the hands of the railroads. Whether the pending bill be wise or not, the means taken to crush it out are reprehensible. By the admission of one of the leading opponents of the measure, the crowd around the railroad committee to-day was made up of men who are the recipients of favors from the railroads. They could not refuse nor neglect to obey when summoned, because the railroads, under existing laws, are their masters. If they hesitate to come to the relief of the railroads when they are wanted, they run the risk of losing the enjoyment of those favors by reason of which they fare better than their neighbors. The whole proceeding was, it is not too much to say, a species of intimidation, which, if allowed to come into practice at Albany, will be a source of great evil."

The commission feature, however, was enacted into a law, but the commission has been constantly hampered for want of power, and its decisions have been disobeyed and disregarded. The railroads would not object to a national commission with limited powers, to act as a buffer between them and public opinion, and the danger is that such a law will be passed and that they will control the appointment of a majority of the commissioners in their interest. I am of the opinion that any adequate law for the regulation of interstate commerce should embody the foregoing provisions, that the commissioners should be given adequate power and be paid salaries as high as railroad companies pay for similar talent.

That these reforms, if real and genuine, will be opposed alike by the railroads and favored shippers, experience in New York and other States shows. Eloquent advocates, both in and out of Congress, will endeavor to show that the proposed remedies will work more harm than the evils which exist. Favored localities and favored shippers will honestly and earnestly endeavor to show this, but the welfare of the many should prevail over that of the privileged few, and the Congress which grapples with and provides a remedy for the great wrongs known to exist will be a memorable one in the history of this country?

F. B. THURBER, New York.

The facts stated by Mr. Thurber seem to me to be a complete and full argument that ought to leave no doubt in the mind of any member on this floor as to his duty in giving the subject of interstate commerce a preference in the business that may come before this House.

One-half of all the laboring people of this country are engaged in agriculture, and more than any other industry is agriculture subject to and under the absolute control of railroad management, and there will be no satisfactory settlement of this question until the Congress of the United States shall pass a just and reasonable law regulating the commerce between the States carried on by the railroads. The annual product in bushels of the different kind of grain in the United States is about 3,000,000,000, and an unjust exaction of 1 cent per bushel takes away from the farmers of this country $30,000,000.

Even conceding that freight rates may be reasonable at times, yet it is important they should be made public and not be subject to constant change.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—yeas 71, noes 95.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 28 members voting therefor—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XXI, by inserting after the word "progress" the words "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government," and by striking out the following clause:

"Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures."

So as to make the rule read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

Mr. McCOMAS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether, under this clause as proposed to be amended, it will be in order at any time for any member to move to amend an appropriation bill by striking out any sum of money proposed to be appropriated and inserting a less sum. In other words, I wish to know whether this clause will allow the amplest opportunity for amendments reducing sums of money proposed to be appropriated by an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is his province to decide in advance questions of construction which may arise under these rules. He is called upon to decide such questions only when presented in the course of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I now offer, and ask the Clerk to read, an amendment of which I gave notice and which is printed on page 298 of the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to clause 3, Rule XXI, the following words: "Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The purpose of this amendment is to avoid any controversy that might otherwise arise in regard to the meaning and effect of this rule. The fact that there is such controversy has been brought to our attention time and again during the course of the debates in this House. The Committee on Rules have simply struck out "the Holman amendment," so called, and have restored, word for word, I think, the precise rule which prevailed in the Forty-third Congress. As there was controversy in that Congress in reference to the meaning of this rule, there will be such controversy again if it be readopted now without the amendment which I propose. The "Holman amendment" is a prohibition of legislation upon appropriation bills; but to that prohibition there are subjoined certain exceptions.

If the Committee on Rules had stricken out these exceptions, and left the first part of the amendment standing, there would be, I think, no question as to its construction. But they have stricken out not only the exceptions but the general prohibition, leaving the subject without any rule to govern it. If this question be left to general parliamentary law, there is no parliamentary law excluding legislation from appropriation bills.

That there is a division of opinion in the House on this subject is clear. One of my colleagues said the other day that when the "Holman amendment" was adopted a "Pandora's box" of evil was opened. He must have meant that before this amendment was adopted it was not in order to legislate upon an appropriation bill. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] have informed us that prior to the Forty-fourth Congress legislation on appropriation bills was of frequent occurrence.

So far as I am concerned I agree with the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Texas, and I do not know why we should not settle the controversy if we can foreclose it by a written rule. If we adopt this rule the decision unquestionably will be against all legislation on appropriation bills.

I have only to add as to the necessity of this amendment that the decision when it comes to be made will not be made by the Speaker of the House but by some chairman of the Committee of the Whole. We do not know who he will be nor which way his views will incline. He may be governed by Mr. Garfield, Senator HOAR, and my colleague from Illinois, and if so he will decide one way; or he may be governed by the great name of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or that of my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and if so he will decide the other way. Let us foreclose the question altogether, and let us settle it by a written rule, so that no decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole depending on some unwritten tradition of the Forty-third Congress will enable any of us to evade it.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to offer the amendment I have laid on the table as a substitute for the pending proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

But no general legislation shall be in order on any general appropriation bill nor as an amendment thereto; and no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditures not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Mr. HAMMOND. It will be plain that my substitute covers a little more ground than that of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. His would forbid appropriations for works in progress. My substitute covers the whole ground, and as I have been heard on it already, I will not further take up the time of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does not the gentleman's substitute also cover the first part of the rule?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly it does.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A substitute for the whole?

Mr. HAMMOND. That is what I said; it is offered as a substitute for the pending proposition; that is, the rule and his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe a further substitute is now in order.

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the substitute is in order and the gentleman may offer it in the form of a substitute for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will offer it in that form—as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government. Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order upon any general appropriation bill or be received as an amendment thereto, but provisions or amendments for the direct reduction of the number, salary, and compensation of officers and employés of the United States shall be in order on a general appropriation bill if germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will indulge me even at this late hour with an opportunity to point out the direct effect of this amendment. It embodies the words of the rule as reported by the Committee on Rules. It also embodies the words of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which is a part of the former rule heretofore in force. Then it adds these words:

But provisions or amendments for the direct reduction of the number, salary, and compensation of officers and employés of the United States shall be in order on a general appropriation bill if germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Gentlemen will see that it is confined, first, to a direct reduction, not indirect; and secondly, to a reduction of salaries and numbers alone of officers and employés. It is confined to just that narrow scope. I wish to avoid this cry against legislation and yet leave to the House some power for reform, and I trust the House will go at least to that extent. It simply creates and retains the power to reduce the number and salaries of employés in the only manner that experience demonstrates it can be done—on appropriation bills; nothing more.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as the reduction of employés is concerned, either in number or salary, in any branch of the Government, the committee having the bill in charge has full jurisdiction. As to that there is no question. They have the power originally under the statutes, and I presume the gentleman will not controvert my proposition, to add to the number of clerks or to increase their compensation or to reduce their number or compensation. That is the case now. He seeks to go further than that. He seeks to take jurisdiction of an appropriation bill and reduce the salaries of officers under the general statutes. To that I object.

If it is necessary or proper that the salary of any public officer should be reduced, do not let it be done on the general appropriation bill that is brought in here and considered. Do not attempt to force it upon the House by saying you shall reduce this salary or the appropriation bill shall not pass. That is what I object to. I object to a proposition to bring in legislation which may change salaries, and of course that means that the salaries will be the salaries of officers; and it is a matter in which I shall probably have no personal interest; but I do not believe it should be put into the power of any committee charged with appropriating to force this House, at the peril of losing the bill, to reduce salaries in accordance with the recommendations of that committee.

Mr. RYAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is not the rule under which we have heretofore operated framed so as to permit just that very thing? Does it not permit a reduction of salaries, as well as the other—the reduction of officers?

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as the salaries of clerks are concerned, yes; but so far as the salaries of officers, under general statutes, are concerned, I apprehend, no.

Mr. RYAN. I ask the gentleman further, if the provision by which a former Congress voted this back pay or salary grab was not under that identical rule?

Mr. HISCOCK. Under the identical rule as proposed here?

Mr. RYAN. As reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know how that may be. I know that if there is any authority for legislation of that kind it is cured by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], and which I hope will be adopted. What I am in favor of is the elimination of all legislation from these bills.

But there is another point in connection with this subject to which I desire to say a word. When you once commence to amend, after a bill has been brought in here to the House and the House has jurisdiction over the bill and the legislation which it proposes then you scarce know where the privilege of amending may be extended or to what point it may go. It is to depend on the mind of the person, whoever he may be, who is chosen chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Now, I do not propose to have a chairman of the Committee of the Whole say—for such will be the effect of it—how much jurisdiction a committee may have over a particular subject. Eliminate it all from the bill; and this rule, as I said before, giving all these committees ample opportunity to get their special legislation before the House, will permit them to bring it in, and then after bringing in a bill to change salaries, if it be adopted, let them make the appropriations in accordance.

Mr. MILLS. If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is adopted, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the greater part of the work done by the Committee on Rules will have been done in vain. The object in the main, as I understand it, of the Committee on Rules in revising this system of rules was to distribute the work and confine committees to the discharge of the duties belonging to them and for which they are created.

In other words, the proposition here is to make each committee of the House equal to the other committees. It requires the Committee on Appropriations to attend to appropriations solely, and the Committee on the Judiciary to attend to the judicial affairs of the country, the Committee on Military Affairs to military matters. But now, after having gone so far, the gentleman from Indiana invites us to let him open the bars and get into the field, and all our work which has been accomplished so far will have been in vain. He says his amendment only relates to the number of officers of the Government and their salaries. Why, Mr. Speaker, I remember at the last session of Congress when the Committee on Appropriations—not the Tariff Committee, but the Committee on Appropriations—brought in a bill with a provision reorganizing every one of our customs districts. They thought it a matter over which they could take jurisdiction and economize. The Committee on Ways and Means was absolutely ignored, and we had a fight here on the floor of the House whether the Committee on Appropriations should assume jurisdiction of that subject or whether it should remain with the Committee on Ways and Means to reorganize the customs service as recommended. If an amendment is to be adopted by which the Committee on Appropriations can put a sponge upon the Judiciary Committee and blot it out as a parliamentary body, why then they can send the Committee on Military Affairs to Van Dieman's Land, and any other committee of the House to sheol or any other country, when once you give them the power which this amendment would confer upon them. [Laughter.] If you help them strike at an officer, then they can strike at a whole subject over which that officer is appointed; and if we intend to carry out the policy adopted here, or which has been recommended by the committee in this reformation of the rules, let us confine each committee closely within the limits of its own jurisdiction as we shall define it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in answer to what has been said but a very few words. I think during the last twenty years not a bill can be found reported to this House, or any provision of a bill, reducing the salaries or the number of public employés as an independent measure which became a law. I speak with some confidence on this point. For the period of twenty years, confined indeed to the last ten, every reduction that has been made, every approach made to economy in the salaries of officers or in public employments, unless in some exceptional cases, has been made through the instrumentality of an appropriation bill. This measure I propose confines the power of the House in legislating on appropriation bills, as I see nothing more can be hoped for, to the simple contracted—I think improperly restricted—power of reducing the number of public employés and their salaries; nothing more.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] reminds me of a very interesting fact. Two years ago—more than two years ago—when a great citizen of New York was at the head of the Treasury Department, under the last administration, he reported to Congress that there was necessity, in his opinion, for the reorganization of the customs districts, by which a reduction of about half a million dollars a year might be made in expenditures in the collection of the customs revenues.

I admit that the Committee on Appropriations, after waiting patiently for the action of some other committee, did try to carry out that recommendation of the Republican Secretary of the Treasury, did try upon an appropriation bill to reduce your expenditures to the extent of half a million of dollars in conformity with that recommendation in a single branch of the service. I admit all that. Was there anything in that to justify condemnation? Would it have done injury to the public service? Did it matter from what committee it came?

Every gentleman who has been in the House for any considerable period knows that if there has been the abolition of a single office or the reduction of a single salary it has been through one of these appropriation bills. Can you not trust the various committees that have charge of these bills—the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on the Post-Offices, the Committee on Naval Affairs—you have invested with power to control appropriation bills. Can you not trust these various committees to make reductions on the appropriation bills, the only bills that will become laws? No appeal, I trust, is necessary to the gentlemen around me who are receiving every day from their constituencies demands that the extravagance incident to a great war and an inflated currency not yet remedied shall be reformed. It is absolutely necessary that the extent of the powers of legislation shall be such as to permit the accomplishment of such a result unless a new policy is intended. Certainly we can not hesitate to confer on these various committees having charge of the subject the power of reducing the number of officers where necessary, or the amount of salaries, where the salaries are found excessive, unless we intend to abandon all efforts at reform, and take the Government as we find it, as needing no improvement at our hands.

Mr. MILLS. The argument of the gentleman from Indiana is to the effect that if there is a committee of this House which the Committee on Appropriations thinks is not discharging its duty the Committee on Appropriations can take the business which belongs to that committee as a subject of legislation and report it to this House. It is true, as stated by the gentlemen and as was stated before by myself, that the Secretary of the Treasury did report that the customs districts could be changed and a large saving made to the Government. The Committee on Ways and Means appointed a subcommittee of which I was chairman, and I went to the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate the matter with a view to preparing a bill to report to the House, and I found this to be the state of the case: There had been simply drawn lines on the surface of the map in this district here, this district there, and this district over yonder. When I looked at the districts I found that they had no reference to commercial points. There was one in Virginia which looked very pretty on the map, but when the people of Virginia came and complained, "You have changed our commercial point and assigned it to a place where the railroad does not terminate," and when I reported that fact to the Secretary of the Treasury and invited his investigation he referred me to the bureau man, and the bureau man admitted that he had made a mistake because he had known nothing as to the railroad.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did you not also find that in that report the Secretary had made a mistake, and that the result, if it had been carried out, would have been simply to cripple the service and make no saving to the Government?

Mr. MILLS. I found out it was a work so large that we had to investigate and continue our investigation, and we could not in one session reconcile all conflicting interests and bring in such a bill as ought to have been brought in.

Mr. MORRISON. Until this debate I have always understood that the main purpose of the power to enact or put legislation on appropriation bills was to force the other branch of the national Legislature to agree to some reductions reducing the cost and expense of administration. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] now tells us that no bill has been reported by any committee other than the Committee on Appropriations to reduce any of these expenditures. Why, sir, is this the fact if it is a fact? It is because and only because we had assumed here on the authority of our Appropriations Committee that the legislative body at the other end of the Capitol, in the interest of their own friends, then holding all the offices, would resist these reductions; and therefore the Committee on Appropriations has been allowed to have complete and absolute control of the subject. I insist again, as I have already, the Senate is not going to stand in the way of our reducing the compensation of our own officials. If the necessity or justification for such legislation ever existed it no longer exists.

As to the words inserted in clause 3 of Rule XXI, authorizing appropriations for contingencies, you will find in every general appropriation bill which has come from the hands of the Committee on Appropriations in the last ten years a considerable sum appropriated for contingencies unauthorized by any law—not reducing expenditures but often increasing them—and without any rule under which it might be done. And I violate no trust or committee secrets when I say it was at the instance of the Speaker this much-criticised clause was inserted, in order that that which before had been done without a rule and in violation of existing rules might be done in conformity with the rules only for necessary contingencies.

I have no objection, nor has any member of the Committee on Rules, to having that clause stricken out. And further, in order to make this more secure against the possibility of increased expenditure, I am willing for myself that the proposition of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], which is perhaps more definite in prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills, may be adopted. Nor have I any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND]. Either will do what the Committee on Rules sought to accomplish. I trust, therefore, if the report is to be amended it will be amended by one or the other of these propositions, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be voted down. Either the amendment of my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] or that of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will be entirely acceptable, but that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] keeps alive the old mischief and again opens the way to confusion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. How does he propose to accomplish the object of reducing the number of employés or the amount of salaries if he shuts off every opportunity to make amendments on the only bills reasonably certain to become law?

Mr. MORRISON. I shut off nothing—no opportunity. Why, sir, any of these committees having charge of any particular Department, service, or branch of the public service, if they find that the expenditures are extravagant and beyond what is just and right, beyond what the public service requires, more than reasonable compensation, will have the right to bring in a bill to meet the case. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has just secured for the committee of which he was the head in the last Congress the right to report at any time. If he, or some other head of the committee, should find that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or other officer or employé in that branch of the public service, is receiving more money as compensation than he ought to have, it will, under that privilege, be the duty of the Public Lands Committee to report a bill to cut off or reduce such compensation. When any such bill is presented here and passed, is there a member of this House who honestly believes that any Senator of the majority will stand in the way of such reduction? Not one. Why should they?

Mr. HOLMAN. I predict that if you set up this barrier against economy there will not be the reduction of the salary of a solitary employé of the Government.

Mr. MORRISON. There is no "barrier." The gentleman assumes that nobody is going to serve the public and the public interest but a member of that committee of which he has been so long an important part. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman has said he is willing that either the amendment of his colleague or my amendment should be adopted. I desire to call his attention to the fact that the amendment of his colleague omits certain words which mine retains—the words "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." The gentleman does not desire to have those words left out, does he?

Mr. MORRISON. Oh, no.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then the gentleman is in favor of my proposition as embodying all that should be included.

Mr. RYAN and others. That is right.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman misapprehends. The language with reference to contingencies for the various Departments is in the proposition which I have submitted.

Mr. HAMMOND. But it is not in mine.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not; and there would be the trouble. I have taken the rule just as reported by the Committee on Rules, have added what was proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, which was part of the old rule, but have added the proposition allowing the reduction of salaries and the abolition of unnecessary offices. That is all—nothing more. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to support briefly the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. This proposition does not authorize a committee to bring in a rider upon an appropriation bill, but simply allows the committee to report, or members of the House to propose, amendments reducing directly the number and pay of officers and employés of the Government. It simply allows this House, when the appropriation bills are before it, to determine how much compensation shall be given to the officers of the Government and how many officers we shall have.

It is well known to the country, and I hope it will be better known to this House when we come to consider the appropriation bills than it seems to be now, that our present President and heads of the Departments have shown the necessity for a large reduction in the number and pay of officers and employés of the Government. We ought to supplement the wise economies of this Democratic administration by legislation looking to such reductions. This is all that the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana contemplates. I hope that this Democratic majority will not now give up every opportunity that has heretofore been afforded to the Appropriations Committee in reference to the reduction of the expenditures of the Government. We have surrendered much; we have given away almost everything to the other side. I hope we shall now reserve to ourselves the privilege of bringing about something in the way of reform and economy.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, if we had not had some experience under this proposition of the gentleman from Indiana I might agree with him as to its necessity and efficacy. But for several years, under a rule authorizing what the gentleman proposes, almost every Committee on Appropriations has come in here with propositions to increase the salaries of somebody in the Departments. That has been the practice. I remember, for instance——

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend say this rule would allow that?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir; but you will do it in spite of the rule, as you have done.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, under that rule, in a legislative appropriation bill which I have now in my mind, the salaries of the assistant or deputy commissioners of patents were increased. There have been a number of such increases. The theory of the rule is very beautiful, but——

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend knows very well that any such increase would under the rule be subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, I know it; yet, notwithstanding that fact, such provisions were reported in these bills and passed time and again. I do not believe in giving to that committee any such authority. It has been abused. Sir, it has been hinted sometimes that persons who were favorites of gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations had had their salaries increased. I do not believe in being misled by a proposition which on its face is exceedingly fair. We have suffered from this abuse. I think it better that there should be no increase of salaries in this way.

Now, I am not disposed to take the position of my friend from Indiana a while ago, that there is no other committee that will look after economy in this respect.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh! I did not say that.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the gentleman said in reference to the reorganization of the employés in the customs service that the Committee on Appropriations found nobody else would do it, and they took it up. I am afraid they will find themselves in that condition all the while. I am therefore opposed to this proposition.

There is an additional reason against the proposition—the greater temptation that there may be at the present time for such things as I have referred to. This side of the House is in the majority. It has the control of the administration. The important employés are in the several Departments. We shall be constantly tempted, and a thousand fold more than we have ever been before, to violate this rule and to abuse these provisions, as we have done under this rule in the past.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very remarkable view to take of this question. A positive rule to allow only reduction of salaries and reduction of the force of public officers my friend from Georgia is afraid will be taken advantage of to enlarge the force of employés and the compensation which is paid to them.

Mr. BLOUNT. What I am afraid of is that you will not obey the rule any more in the future than you have in the past.

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be, the rule may be violated; but I submit, sir, that is no argument against the rule itself. And if under a rule designed for the express purpose of reducing the expenses of the Government—if under such a rule there has been still further increase of salaries and of the number of employés, can this House afford to run the risk of adopting a new code of rules in which no opportunity for reduction either of salaries or the force of employés is permitted?

Mr. HERBERT. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana a question right here.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. Is it not a fact that the number of employés generally is not fixed by law at all?

Mr. HOLMAN. As a general thing.

Mr. HERBERT. But that it depends entirely upon appropriations made in appropriation bills. If the committee appropriates money for them, very well; and if not, very well. You have without this rule for which you contend the power then either to increase or to decrease the salaries and the number of employés.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. Then if you have, this discussion it seems to me is proceeding with an entire misunderstanding of the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Within certain limitations that is correct. There are many clerks in the Departments the body of them not provided for by law except as to classes upon the appropriation bills. The great body of employés in every branch of the public service is provided for by classifications, but the great body of officers is provided for by law. You can on appropriation bills refuse to make an appropriation, but that does not abolish the office, but leaves it still standing.

Mr. HERBERT. It is only the highest officers and not the great body of employés to which that refers.

Mr. HOLMAN. The great body of offices. I never expected to be called upon to urge on this side of the House a proposition like this—a necessary rule if reforms are to be made. I am asking simply the opportunity should be left to reduce what we have claimed heretofore, that the public service was overburdened with unnecessary offices, that we should be permitted to offer propositions to reduce their number, which we have insisted was more than the public service required, and to reduce a multitude of salaries which we have pronounced to be unnecessarily large.

There is not a stump, sir, in this whole land from which has not rung out the denunciations of Democratic orators that these expenditures were greatly beyond what the people ought to endure. Is it now possible that this House intends deliberately to set up a barrier against every attempt to retrench expenditures?

Mr. MORRISON. It is only in the imagination of the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. And that, too, when we are occupying these seats under and by virtue of a platform demanding economy and reform in the administration of this Government? At this early moment are we to go back upon that platform?

Gentlemen talk of a new departure, new theories of political action. I shall not believe until it occurs, if it must occur, that this Democratic House will enact an impregnable barrier against all efforts to carry out the pledges we have made to the people and on the strength of which we occupy these seats.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend from Indiana allow me to ask him a question, and that is whether he has no hope in any other committee than his own?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not speaking of any committee. I am on no committee. I never indulge in personal allusions or personal preferences in debate. I am speaking simply of the effect of these rules on all committees.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not mean it in any personal sense.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nor have I referred to any committee. I have served on many of the committees in this House, and have found them all composed of able and efficient members. I claim nothing more for the Committee on Appropriations than for any other committee in this House.

You have sent these appropriation bills by your vote to different committees. Why not then trust those committees with the power to restrict the expenses of the Government in the several departments placed under their control. As the rule came from the Committee on the Rules it opens the door for increase in expenditures by increase of salaries at least. That very rule, so far as the last clause is concerned, has been through all the years it was in force so interpreted—was designed for the express purpose of enabling the House to increase salaries on appropriation bills.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I understand the only difference between my proposition and that of the gentleman from Georgia consists in this, that if my proposition is adopted then the following words will be a part of the rule, "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government;" and that if his proposition is adopted those words will not be a part of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Well, I desire to say simply this, that so far as the words in italics are concerned I would be glad to be permitted to modify my proposition by moving to strike out that part of the report of the Committee on Rules, that is to say, that part providing for "contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government," and add the words printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he allow the House to have a vote upon the first proposition, and then take the other up after we have disposed of that.

Mr. CASWELL. I have submitted and had printed in the RECORD a motion to strike out the very words to which the gentleman from Illinois refers.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. It is understood that this provision applies to appropriation bills, no matter where they are.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, 40 members only voting in favor thereof and 162 against.

Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HOLMAN, and others demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MORRISON were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported 57 in the affirmative and 203 in the negative. So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 205, not voting 50; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. PAYSON, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], which the Clerk will again report.

The amendment was again read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65.

Before the negative vote was announced,

Mr. HAMMOND. It seems preferable that the other side shall pass it; therefore I am perfectly willing to allow them that privilege.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], which will be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 5, Rule XXI, as follows:

"5. All bills for improvement of rivers and harbors, and for the establishment or change of post-routes, shall be delivered to the Clerk, as in the case of petitions and memorials, for reference to appropriate committees."

Amend Rule XXI by inserting the following as clause 6:

"No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following-named committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and to the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. EVERHART. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXI, as clause 7:

"No vote shall be taken on the adoption of any conference committee report, or on the final passage of any amended bill or joint resolution, before said report, bill, or resolution shall have been printed for the use of the members. And this rule shall be suspended, not by a two-thirds vote, as provided for the suspension of other rules, but only by unanimous consent."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXIII.

Amend clause 4, Rule XXIII, as follows:

"4. In Committees of the Whole House business on their Calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to passing over any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of my colleague [Mr. COBB] to the fact that the Committee on Public Lands is not placed in the same relation to the business here as other committees. I suggest that the bills reported by the Committee on Public Lands should be included in the exception.

Mr. COBB. I will move to amend the clause so as to include bills reported by the Public Lands Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the gentleman desires to have precedence for the same measures as are included in the other amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; measures relating to the forfeiture of land grants.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that bills relating to forfeited land grants do not go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. That is true. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I see that there is a slight change here between the proposition which was referred to the Committee on Rules and the proposition as reported by the Committee on Rules in this respect: When objection is made to the consideration of a bill under the rule as reported by the Committee on Rules—

The committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide without debate whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present.

I desire to strike out the words "shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which;" so that it will read:

The committee shall decide without debate whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present.

That is the form in which the proposition was referred to the committee. And it seems to me if you are to transact any business in Committee of the Whole this amendment is necessary. If every time the objection is made you have to go back into the House where a yea-and-nay vote can be called and filibustering can be resorted to, it is impossible a committee can ever reach any bill if a minority of the House is opposed to it. It seems to me all our arrangements for transacting business would be nullified if you require the committee to rise and report the objection to the House, where filibustering could begin and all proceedings with reference to the bill could be cut off. I hope the amendment will be adopted as originally reported by my colleague [Mr. MORRISON]. It seems to be in consequence of some omission and accident that it has not been reported back.

Mr. MORRISON. There has been no omission. My colleague is correct as to what was introduced. The committee thought differently and that the provision should stand as in the old rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am sorry that all that rigmarole is to be perpetuated, of the Committee of the Whole jumping up and going back and in and out every minute. I had hoped that we would have got rid of some of that rubbish. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I renew the amendment. I want to draw the attention of the House to the report of the Committee on Rules in the line of the remarks of my colleague from the Springfield district [Mr. SPRINGER]. I would also like to call the attention of my friend from Maine, of the Committee on Rules [Mr. REED], who in former sessions and in this, by his able remarks on this rule, has made a convert of me completely on this subject.

I want to say, as I understand this rule and its operation heretofore and as to what its operation will be in the future, that as it now is proposed to be adopted there is more delay by far in it than there is in any other provision that has been talked about or advocated or believed in by gentlemen who have discussed these rules for the last two or three days. I submit if we are to have peace and harmony, and if everybody is to have his legislation done in a minute and a half after he wants it accomplished, we had better adopt the original proposition of my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] and reject this recommendation of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I have had the pleasure of describing to the House this interesting performance referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. I take back nothing that I have said on that subject. Personally I desired to modify our rules so as to meet this suggestion of the gentleman, but it was thought not advisable by other gentlemen to do it. I did not insist upon it, because the relief which I proposed to provide in the set of rules which I submitted to previous Congresses has been provided for in another way.

My plan was to allow members acting under the direction of their committees to go to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole and take up any bill by name. The method now proposed by the Committee on Rules is that during the morning hour now provided for—the morning hour for action—any committee may be allowed to call up, without regard to its order as reported, any bill, not only bills upon the House Calendar, which contain no appropriations of money, but also bills upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which do appropriate money. It is only when we go to the Committee of the Whole, outside of the moring hour and by a vote of the House, that we shall take up bills in their order upon the Calendar.

It will be seen that under these circumstances the method of procedure will be less cumbersome and less objectionable than when we had no morning hour for the consideration of bills and the House had no right to go into the Committee of the Whole to take up a particular bill. Still I must say I fully agree with the idea of the gentleman from Illinois that the procedure which he would abolish is cumbersome.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SPRINGER, there were—ayes 61, noes 73.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules was read, as follows:

In Rule XXIV, clause 1, strike out the word "joint" before the word "resolutions;" so as to make the clause read as follows:

"1. Each Monday morning during a session of Congress, immediately after the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting has been read and approved, the Speaker shall call all the States and Territories in alphabetical order for bills and resolutions for printing and reference without debate, on which call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures may be presented and appropriately referred, and on this call only resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order for reference to appropriate committees, which resolutions shall be reported to the House within one week thereafter."

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to inquire whether it was the intention of the Committee on Rules that the presentation to the House of executive communications and Senate messages upon the Speaker's table should be omitted on Mondays?

Mr. HISCOCK. In the next clause of the rule the presentation of such business for reference to appropriate committees is provided for.

Mr. BURROWS. But there seems to be a conflict between the two provisions. This clause provides that on each Monday morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the Speaker shall call the States and Territories. The next clause provides that "after the Journal is read and approved each day the Speaker shall lay before the House for reference" executive communications and also bills, resolutions, &c., from the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, with the permission of the House, that in clause 2 of this rule, which will be next read, the words "except Monday" should be inserted, in line 307, after the words "each day;" otherwise these two rules would require two different things to be done on Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BURROWS. It appears to me that such an amendment is necessary.

The proposed amendment to clause 1 was agreed to.

Clause 2 of Rule XXIV, as proposed by the Committee on Rules, was read, as follows:

After the Journal is read and approved each day, the Speaker shall lay before the House, for reference, messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments and other communications addressed to the House, and also such bills, resolutions, and other messages from the Senate as may have been received on the previous day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to inserting in this clause after the words "each day" the words "except Monday?" This amendment seems to be necessary in order to prevent an apparent conflict in the rules; and if there be no objection it will be inserted.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will it not be necessary also to make a change in the language at the close of the clause—"on the previous day?" There might be on the Speaker's table the accumulation of two days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the rule would be construed as meaning the previous legislative day—the day when the House was last in session.

There being no objection, the proposed amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules was read as follows:

In clause 3, Rule XXIV, strike out the words "Journal is read and approved," and insert "business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of;" so as to make the clause read:

"3. On all days other than Monday, as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate; and the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in regular order and then upon the select committees; and if the whole of the hour is not consumed by this call, then it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of other business as hereafter provided; but if he shall not complete the call within the hour, he shall resume it in the succeeding morning hour where he left off."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

"Insert, as clause 5 of Rule XXIV, the following:

After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day on either the House or Union Calendar. And whenever any committee shall have occupied the said hour for one day, it shall not be in order for such committee to designate any other proposition for consideration until all the other committees shall have been called in their turn; and when any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call it shall thereafter remain on the Calendar as unfinished business and be taken up in its order: Provided, That when the hour herein prescribed shall expire while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is considering a bill the said committee shall rise without motion therefor."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It does not seem quite clear from the phraseology of this provision whether it will give a committee the right to call up more than one bill if the first bill called up does not consume the hour. I suggest this point, so that the intention of the committee may be made plain.

A MEMBER (to Mr. WARNER, of Ohio). Move an amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend by inserting after the words "any bill" the words "or bills."

The SPEAKER. Under this provision each committee will have one hour in which to call up bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If that is the understanding.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That will be the inference from the last clause.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. After the hour under the preceding clause shall have been occupied, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to know what the effect of this rule will be in reference to the business of the Committee on Public Lands. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that it does not seem to be clear after an hour has been given to a bill and it has gone to the Calendar it will have priority. It seems to me that committees authorized to report at any time should have priority. Motions will be in order as at present to go into committee. It might be possible under these rules that bills reported from that Committee on the Public Lands might go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Bills forfeiting public lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. If they do not make appropriations or grants of land they do not go there necessarily.

The clause as read was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. Unfinished business, if any, having been disposed of, motions shall be in order as follows:

First. That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other business on its Calendar.

Second. To proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. WILLIS. I move after the words "general appropriation bills," in line 364, to insert "bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors;" so it will read:

First. That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and then other business on its Calendar.

Mr. MORRISON. This is the old rule. These are simply transpositions, and because other clauses were inserted these came lower down. They are the old rules, word for word.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will make no objection to my amendment.

Mr. MORRISON. I do make objection. These rules are the same as they were before.

Mr. REED, of Maine. These rules give the same power as before.

Mr. WILLIS's amendment was rejected; and section 7, as read, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XXVI as follows:

"RULE XXVI.

"Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting."

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the committee is to strike out the words "by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting" and in lieu thereof to insert "by the House."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not see the necessity for that rule at all with the preceding clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the report of the committee by adding to Rule LIV the following:

Bills of a private character heretofore printed by order of either House shall not be again printed, unless it appears that all printed copies have been exhausted.

If that rule be adopted it will result in saving from forty-five to fifty thousand dollars. It provides that bills of a private character heretofore printed by order of either House shall not be again printed unless it appears that all printed copies have been exhausted.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask to turn back to line 313, on page 14, and strike out the words "as may have been received on the previous day" and insert "as may have been received on preceding days;" so it will read:

2. After the Journal is read and approved each day, the Speaker shall lay before the House, for reference, messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments and other communications addressed to the House, and also such bills, resolutions, and other messages from the Senate as may have been received on the previous day.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think that is necessary.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; I think the gentleman's suggestion is a good one.

The SPEAKER. Instead of reading "such bills, resolutions, and other messages from the Senate as may have been received on the previous day," that it shall read "as may have been received on previous days."

Mr. MORRISON. That was proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON demanded the previous question on the adoption of the report as amended.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. If the previous question be ordered would that preclude amendments to other portions of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The other rules are not inserted in this report.

Mr. MORRISON. But it adopts the old rules.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. It seems to me the motion does carry with it the adoption of the other rules.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. MORRISON. Ordering the previous question carries with it the other rules.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the Committee on Rules as amended was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to call up the resolution providing for the adjournment for the holidays.

Mr. BEACH. Does that require unanimous consent?

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 22, 1885, they stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1886.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that that be changed so as to read, "Monday, December 21," instead of "Tuesday, 22d."

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend by inserting "Saturday, the 19th."

Mr. KELLEY. The Senate has adjourned until Monday, and can not take action upon that.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, as now modified, which provides for an adjournment from Monday next until Tuesday, January 5.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, is that resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BEACH. I would like to be heard for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I have always looked upon this holiday recess as a childish proceeding, discreditable to the House and detrimental to the public interest, and ever since I have been here I have invariably opposed it. My opposition in the past, however, has been in vain, and I have no hopes now of any better success and I do not care to repeat the arguments I have advanced on former occasions, but I deem it my duty to call the attention of members briefly to a single fact before they proceed to vote upon this resolution. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

A very grave responsibility rests upon this House. The death of the Vice-President has given rise to a feeling of great disquietude throughout the country. There is a broadcast fear, which I rejoice to notice is not partisan in its nature, that in the event of the death of the President a crisis might arise which would shake not only the political but the business circles of the country to the center.

When we consider the uncertainty of human life and the vast interests that depend upon the life of our Executive, is it not time for us to pause and formulate some legislation which will effectuate the will of the people as expressed at the polls a year ago last November? Should not the Democratic House go as far in this direction as the Republican Senate? We are in the second week of the session and as yet nothing has been done in this House to perpetuate the Democratic administration which the people after twenty-five years of Republican rule have called into power. The Administration is Democratic to-day, but how may it be to-morrow?

The morning papers of to-morrow may tell us that the President is dead and the Republican President of the Senate has taken the oath of office as President of the United States. Should such a condition of things be allowed to exist? The Republican Senate, with a broad patriotism which does it honor, says no. What say we? Nothing—simply nothing. We propose to take a recess of two weeks and leave this vital question until our return. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim that it is our duty to sit in these seats until this question of the Presidential succession is settled, so far as it is in the power of this House to settle it. Until it is settled there should be no adjournment whatever. A vast responsibility rests upon the members of this House, and I for one shall vote against this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Illinois.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we can do no business to-morrow and will adjourn on Monday. It would relieve a great many gentlemen living at a distance from the capital who desire to go home if we can get consent that on to-morrow we may introduce bills as on Monday, and I ask unanimous consent that there be a call of States to-morrow for that purpose.

Several members objected.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. Evidently we will do no business to-morrow. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make perhaps not exactly a parliamentary inquiry, but to ask if it is not probable that there may be some further amendments to these rules in reference to the creation of select committees, which business can be transacted to-morrow if the House is in session; and if we adjourn on Monday, unless the Speaker desires it, it may interfere with the constitution of the committees.

Mr. MORRISON. That is the object of our working to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee on Rules has under consideration the propriety of the reappointment of certain of the select committees of previous Congresses. The Committee on Rules will have a meeting to-morrow, and hopes to make a report to the House before the recess and have the question disposed of, so as to know what committees are to be provided for.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I did not intend by my motion to interfere in any manner with the business to be transacted. I supposed that there would not be anything done to-morrow in view of the fact that objection was made to the introduction of bills. I thought it likely that many members who had business in the Departments would have an opportunity to-morrow to attend to such business, so as to be prepared to start for their homes on Monday. But as it seems that the House may transact some business of importance on to-morrow, then I ask permission to withdraw my motion.

There was no objection.

PENSION TO MRS. GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, the Senate to-day by unanimous consent passed a bill to place the widow of General Grant upon the pension-rolls, and I am requested to ask unanimous consent of this House that that bill may be passed to-day. It is the usual bill, giving $5,000 a year to Mrs. Grant during the remainder of her natural life. The same sum has been given to widows of ex-Presidents of the United States heretofore, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Julia D. Grant, the widow of the late Ulysses S. Grant, deceased, on the pension roll, and to pay her a pension during her natural life at the rate of $5,000 a year from and after the 23d day of July, A. D. 1885.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I now renew my appeal to the House, that we may have unanimous consent for the introduction of bills to-morrow. This will give the Clerk the whole time until after the adjournment to make up the record. And I wish to say that the condition of my affairs at home, on account of sickness, is such that I would like to have an opportunity to-morrow of introducing some bills which I desire very much to have introduced.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think the House can take up the Presidential succession bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. We can do that to-morrow or we can do it now.

Mr. PETERS. I would remark that it is in the knowledge of those who were members of the last Congress that the introduction of bills then took two days. We can not get through on Monday if we begin it then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow be set apart for the introduction of bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not to interfere with the Presidential succession bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Several members objected.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, until the 10th of January, 1886.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. LAIRD to extend in the RECORD his remarks made during the discussion of the report on the rules.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY: Petitions and papers in the case of John B. Ege, of Petersburg, Va., for pay of printing materials and use and occupancy of building by the United States military forces during April, May, June, and July, 1865, at Petersburg, Va., after he had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Memorial of Nancy Black, widow of Allen Black, praying the reference of her claim to the Court of Claims under act of March 3, 1883—to the same committee.

By Mr. COMPTON: Petition of heir of Matilda Chase, deceased, for wood, &c., taken for army use near Annapolis, Md., during the war of 1861, and stated at $8,950—to the same committee.

By Mr. GLASS: Petitions of W. A. Allison; of Josiah Baker; of Joshua Baker; of John J. Burrow; of J. B. Bradberry; of L. R. Burwell; of Zachariah Bryant; of James Cook; of Paul C. Crafton; of J. W. Crafton; of Isaac W. Coppedge; of J. C. Ferris; of G. H. Ramsey; of C. E. Robertson; of Mrs. Martha S. Scales, widow of James H. Scales; of J. L. Trimble; of William Erwin; of L. K. Gillespie, heir of John C. Gillespie; and of W. W. Hutchison, administrator of Gillim Jackson; of N. J. Heathcock; of W. H. Holmes; of Stephen S. Hale; of J. T. Peck; of George E. Rust; of William P. Posey; of John A. Roe; of J. A. Roe; of James E. Wood, of Gibson County, Tennessee; of James E. Wood, of Trenton, Tenn.; of Eloe A. Harper; of George W. Sims; of Z. C. Nolen; of Richard Hill, and of trustees of Humboldt Female College, in Gibson County, Tennessee, asking compensation for property taken by the United States Army during the late war—to the same committee.

By Mr. GIFFORD: Memorial from the people of the proposed State of Dakota, praying for admission into the Union of States, also accompanying papers, consisting of a certified copy of the constitution of the proposed State and certified copy of the journal of the convention which framed said constitution—to the Committee on Territories.

By Mr. E. F. STONE: Petition of Frank Dalton, for correction of error in his account—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR: Memorial of the Tennessee State Teachers' Association, asking national aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of steamboatmen, asking the refunding license tax—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TUCKER: Petition of John Kelly, of Alleghany County, Virginia, for property taken by or furnished to the Army of the United States for their use during the war of 1861, in Alleghany County, Virginia, and stated at $9,408.15—to the Committee on War Claims.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 19, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPAIRS IN PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents. It has been returned to the House with an amendment by the Senate, which is merely verbal. I ask concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "necessary," insert the words "to fit up and;" so that it will read:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to use so much of the contingent fund, not exceeding $600, as was appropriated by act of March 3, 1885, for the use of the Interior Department as may be necessary to fit up and put in proper repair the rooms in the Interior Department building which have been assigned by the Secretary for the use of the Commissioner of Patents."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate amendment?

There was no objection.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits a communication received from the president of the North, Central, and South American Exposition, with the request that it be laid before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION,
New Orleans, December 15, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The board of management of the North, Central, and South American Exposition have designated Tuesday, December 29, as "American Congressional Day," and all members of the House are respectfully invited to be present upon that occasion.

The leading object of the exposition is to develop more intimate commercial and social relations between the various nations of the three Americas, and it is earnestly hoped that members of the House may favor us with their presence, and thereby lend the weight of their influence to the promotion of this important work.

Very respectfully,

S. B. MCCONNICO, President.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the exposition at which the members of the House are invited to be present is one of vast importance to the people of the United States. An opportunity will be afforded to meet with representatives from all the governments of Mexico and Central and South America. Exhibits will be found there from nearly all those states as well as from all the States of the Union. I trust the members of the House will avail themselves of the opportunity of mingling with the people from those countries, of witnessing the development made in their commerce and their trade, and of studying the means by which we may bring about closer commercial relations between the governments on this continent.

I have been authorized by the secretary of the exposition to state to the House that arrangements are now being made which will afford an opportunity of securing transportation for the members of the House. I will further say it is not the intention of the managers of the exposition to seek any further aid from Congress. They have already received very liberal help from Congress. It is simply a continuation of the exposition of last winter.

The communication was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following as the Committee on Enrolled Bills: Mr. NEECE of Illinois, Mr. SNYDER of West Virginia, Mr. FISHER of Michigan, Mr. MCREA of Arkansas, Mr. HOLMES of Iowa, Mr. PERKINS of Kansas, and Mr. ALLEN of Massachusetts.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. FINDLAY. I ask unanimous consent to take up, and pass as it came from the Senate, the bill (S. 471) to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President.

The Clerk having read the title of the bill,

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] that the House take up for present consideration this bill?

Mr. MORRISON. I object, for the present.

Mr. PETERS. I dislike to object to the present consideration of that bill——

The SPEAKER. It has been objected to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. FINDLAY. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois has objected only to its immediate consideration.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir; only until I make a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FINDLAY. That was my understanding.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRISON. I present, from the Committee on Rules, the report which I send to the desk, and ask its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following-named select committees of the House for the Forty-ninth Congress are hereby created, namely:

The Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President, to consist of thirteen members, to which shall be referred all propositions touching the election and tenure of office of President and Vice-President, the count of the electoral votes, and the succession to the office of President.

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to consist of thirteen members, to which shall be referred all propositions touching the civil service of the United States.

The Committee on American Ship-Building and Ship-Owning Interests, to consist of thirteen members, to which shall be referred all propositions relating to American ship-building and ship-owning interests, with authority to investigate the causes of the decline of the American foreign carrying trade.

The Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, to consist of eleven members, to which shall be referred all propositions touching the alcoholic liquor traffic.

The Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, to consist of seven members, to which shall be referred all propositions relating to the ventilation and acoustics of the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRISON. These special committees, with others, existed in the last and some former Congresses. This proposition omits, I believe, three special committees of the last Congress. Unless some member objects or wants to speak upon the report, I move its immediate adoption.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the Clerk read again the clause of this report with reference to a select Committee on American Ship-Building.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on American Ship Building and Ship-Owning Interests, to consist of thirteen members, to which shall be referred all propositions relating to American ship-building and ship-owning interests, with authority to investigate the causes of the decline of the American foreign carrying trade.

Mr. REAGAN. This is, I believe, one of the select committees raised during the last Congress. The duties assigned to it belong appropriately to the Committee on Commerce; and I do not see the necessity for this select committee. Its creation will cause some trouble about the reference of bills and the jurisdiction over them. The river and harbor bill having been taken from the Committee on Commerce, it was not necessary further to abridge its jurisdiction by taking away the class of subjects committed to this select committee, and I hope the House will refuse to agree to the creation of this committee.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand whether the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] submitted a motion to strike out the clause of the report to which he has referred.

Mr. REAGAN. That was my intention.

Mr. SPRINGER. Why not have a separate vote on each clause?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to demand a separate vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have a division of the question. That does not interfere with the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It does not; and it will accomplish the purpose of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask a separate vote on the adoption of the clause which has just been read.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If the House will permit me to say a word——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think consent ought to be given.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Maine to make a statement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I did not catch the purport of the observations of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] until this moment; and in the absence of my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY], who has given very special consideration to the subject which will be committed to this special committee, and whose appearance upon the floor in connection with this subject will be remembered by all the members of the last House, I think, in justice to him, I should say that he regards it as very important that this committe should be continued in order to finish the work which it has so well begun. I sincerely hope the House will not strike this from the list of special committees.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The clause of the report authorizing the appointment of a select committee on American ship-building and ship-owing interests (on which a separate vote was demanded by Mr. REAGAN) was agreed to.

The clause authorizing a select committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic (on which a separate vote was demanded by Mr. SPRINGER) was agreed to; there being—ayes 113, noes 13.

No other separate vote being demanded, the question was taken on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Rules; and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF DIGEST.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to offer the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound for the use of the House 2,500 copies of the Digest for the present session.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, in explanation of that, that the printing of this Digest is provided for by the act of March 3, 1877, and this merely fixes the number. That number until the last Congress was always 2,000, but upon the enlargement of the membership of the House the number was increased to 2,500 copies.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not see the necessity of printing so large a number of this book. We should, in my judgment, try to abridge the printing ordered by the House instead of enlarging it. That subject of printing has come to be a serious matter. It is costing a great deal more than it was supposed it ever would cost. I hope we shall in the future cease to indulge in such extravagance. I move to amend by making the number 1,500 instead of 2,500 copies.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. REED, of Maine moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. FINDLAY. I call up Senate bill No. 471, to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President.

Objection was made on this side of the House to the original offer, but as I understand it that was for a temporary purpose. There was objection on the other side of the House, but I understand it is not to be seriously pressed. If it is, we wish to know from which side of the House the objection comes. I ask unanimous consent to put the bill which I have indicated upon its passage, regarding it as the most important bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks to take up by unanimous consent the bill which he has indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. PETERS. Yes; I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland that on Monday next the motion will be in order to suspend the rules, so that this bill may be considered before the holiday recess.

Mr. FINDLAY. I so understand; and in response to the gentleman's suggestion I give notice that I will make that motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill on Monday next.

NATIONAL BANK OF WINONA.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. I ask by unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona.

The bill was read.

Mr. BEACH. I have no special objection to this particular bill, but I have a general objection to this class of legislation. In the last Congress I introduced a bill giving the Comptroller of the Currency power to change the names of these national banks, and I will object to all these special bills until that general bill has been considered and disposed of.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced joint resolution (H. Res. 2) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1885, on the 21st day of said month; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1885, on the 21st day of said month.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. HAMMOND. As the House will adjourn on Monday and the list of States can not be called in one day, I ask we begin the call of States for the introduction of bills to-day, and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. LOWRY. I object.

Mr. HAMMOND. Allow me then, as I am on the floor, to make a personal request. I desired to avoid doing so. I am advised this morning of serious illness in my family, and as I shall leave to-day for home, I ask by unanimous consent I may submit certain bills without waiting for the regular call.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all right.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the same privilege will be accorded to my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who stated last night as a reason for asking unanimous consent that he would be called home because of illness in his family.

There was no objection.

GEORGIA WAR CLAIM.

Mr. HAMMOND introduced a bill (H. R. 1) to require the payment in cash to the State of Georgia of $35,555.42, appropriated for said State by an act to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777, approved March 7, 1883; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the Committee on War Claims when appointed.

Mr. HAMMOND. It went to the Judiciary Committee before, and has been twice reported on by that committee.

Mr. RANDALL. But the rule has since been changed.

The SPEAKER. There is a rule which prohibits the going of any of those claims to any other than claims committees, except by unanimous consent.

The bill was referred to the Committee on War Claims when appointed, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF PROSECUTIONS, STATE TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. HAMMOND also introduced a bill (H. R. 2) to amend section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WAR TAXES.

Mr. HAMMOND also introduced a bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States, as set-off against States having claims against the General Government; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON ALCOHOL.

Mr. HAMMOND also introduced a bill (H. R. 4) to authorize the withdrawal from distillery warehouse, without tax, of alcohol and other spirits to be used in manufacturing and preparing drugs, medicines, and chemicals; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NANCY JOHNSON LONSDALE AND OTHERS.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 5) for the relief of Nancy Johnson Lonsdale, Betty Erwin Brockett, and Laura G. Johnson, heirs at law of E. P. Johnson, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARY S. STONE, ADMINISTRATRIX.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 6) for the relief of Mary S. Stone, administratrix; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE T. REEVES.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 7) for the relief of George T. Reeves; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

EBENEZER T. WHITE.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 8) for the relief of Ebenezer T. White; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN J. HART.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 9) for the relief of John J. Hart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TIMOTHY D. LYNES.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 10) to appropriate money to pay the claim of Timothy D. Lynes, of Georgia, for tobacco seized during the war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL KRIES.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 11) for the relief of Michael Krics, of Fulton County, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RANDOLPH PEYTON.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 12) for the relief of Randolph Peyton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 3) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President, and ordered to be printed.

CARACAS AWARD.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 4) referring the controversy between the United States and Venezuela in respect to the award of Caracas of 1868, to the President; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN WAR PENSION.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 13) granting pensions to soldiers of the Mexican war, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARTIN L. BUNDY.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 14) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. HUNT.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 15) granting a pension to John A. Hunt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committe on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NANCY L. RIBBLE.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 16) granting a pension to Nancy L. Ribble; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS WAR OF 1812.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 17) increasing the pensions of the surviving officers, sailors, and enlisted and drafted men of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 18) granting arrears of pensions to persons pensioned by special act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID C. PAULLUS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of David C. Paullus; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ERNEST BEECHNER.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 20) authorizing the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Private Ernest Beechner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID M. WINKLE.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 21) for the relief of David M. Winkle; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES WINDER.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 22) for the relief of Charles Winder; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CAPITOL AND SOUTH WASHINGTON RAILWAY.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 23) to authorize the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company to extend its lines, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES MOSS.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, also introduced a bill (H. R. 24) for the relief of James Moss; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Important business is demanding my attention at home, and I ask unanimous consent to present a few bills at this time.

Mr. LOWRY. I object.

IMPORTATION OF GLASSWARE.

Mr. PAYNE. Early in the week my colleague [Mr. BURLEIGH] offered a resolution, the consideration of which was objected to at that time by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON]. I understand that that gentleman now withdraws his objection. I ask unanimous consent to call it up now.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to this House such information as he possesses, including copies of all official documents and correspondence on file in his Department, relating to the importation from Bohemia in July last, by L. Lehman, of New York, into the port of New York of certain glassware, and to the appraisment and reappraisement of the same.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to offer an amendment, to insert the words "if compatible with the public interest."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COX. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House except for reference.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be so referred when the committee is appointed.

PAGE AT THE CLERK'S DESK.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to call up the resolution which I offered a few days ago and which is now on the Speaker's table.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to employ Harry Blair Smith as a page at the Clerk's desk in the Hall, and pay him at the rate of $2 per day, out of the contingent fund of the House, until further ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the resolution being referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objects to the present consideration of the resolution. It will be referred to the Committee on Accounts, when appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERKINS. I think it must be the desire of all members that Congress should take its recess on Monday next. If we do that, it is necessary that we should have more than Monday for the introduction of bills, if anything like so many are introduced this session as were introduced at the commencement of the Forty-eighth Congress. For that reason I renew the request for unanimous consent that States and Territories be now called for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that States and Territories be called to-day for bills and resolutions.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I object. The committees have not yet been appointed, and you are not to gain anything by this course, except that it may appear in the RECORD as if some members were more vigilant than others.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that to allow the introduction of bills to-day will be a very great convenience to many members. The motive is not that they may appear in the RECORD, but it is to enable them to get away.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to state that if the Presidential succession bill can be brought up and considered in this House to-day and debated as a bill of that dignity and character should be debated, I will withdraw my objection to its present consideration. My sole reason for making the objection to-day was that I did not believe a bill of that character should be passed through this House without that consideration which it merits; and being opposed to the principle of the bill, I felt it my duty to object to its consideration. But I do not object to its being taken up and debated, and if we can finish the debate upon the bill during the day it can then be passed. I make this statement now because I see from the temper of the House we will not be able to introduce bills to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, if the bill is taken up it will be considered of course under the rules of the House, which allow debate unless the previous question is ordered by the House. What the purpose is of the gentleman who has the bill in charge the Chair can not say.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to understand how much time the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] would desire for debate. Perhaps he will state at what time he would be willing that the previous question shall be moved. If so, we can take up the bill with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman who has asked unanimous consent to take up the bill is not now present to make any arrangement about it, and the Chair does not know his purpose.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The House can make the arrangement. No doubt the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] will agree to any reasonable arrangement.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Kansas state how much time he desires to debate this bill?

Mr. PETERS. Why, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to discuss the provisions of the bill, and I did not make the objection with the desire to have anything to say upon it. I do not know that any member on this side of the House—perhaps none on that—is ready to discuss the subject. But I think there are some questions involved in the bill that should be discussed. I do not believe in the principle involved in the bill; yet, as I said, I am not prepared to go into a discussion of the bill to-day, and I would not like to make any arrangement as to time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Say one or two hours.

Mr. LOWRY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOWRY. I wish to inquire whether next Monday, being the third Monday of the month, is not, under the rules we have adopted, a day when motions to suspend the rules will be in order?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the States and Territories will be called every Monday for the introduction of bills, &c.; but after that call, on next Monday, motions to suspend the rules will be in order.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If I am the only one objecting I will very cheerfully withdraw my objection to the call of States to-day for the introduction of bills.

Mr. RANNEY. If the gentleman withdraws it I will renew it.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I knew a large number of gentlemen were opposed to it.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, for the third time I call up the Senate bill providing for the performance of the duties of President in case of the inability, death, or resignation of the President and Vice-President; and understanding this to be a time to make the motion and not to make a speech, and regarding the passage of this bill as much more important than any speech that can be made by any man on this floor, I move that we put the bill immediately on its passage. I would like to understand from my friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] on the other side whether he still presses his objection to the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. GOFF. I would like to know whether this bill is any more important now than it was at the last session of Congress when it was here.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is just as important now as it was then.

Mr. GOFF. The other side of the House then opposed its consideration altogether. Now the gentleman from Maryland makes an appeal to the House that it is important the bill should be considered immediately.

Mr. FINDLAY. All I have to say to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is, that if the House made a mistake then it is no reason for making a mistake now.

Mr. GOFF. No; the circumstances are changed now.

Mr. FINDLAY. Very well; I understand that "circumstances do alter cases," and wise men are governed by circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Objection seems to be made to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. There is an opportunity now, thanks to the action of the House yesterday, for the transaction of business in regular order; and there is no occasion for stampeding the House with any bill, even though it be a bill which is pretty sure to meet the unanimous support of the entire Republican side of the House in the future as it has in the past. Let us have business conducted regularly and in some sensible way. There is no public exigency that demands such a vociferous display of patriotism as has been exhibited by gentlemen who were opposed to this bill last session.

Mr. FINDLAY. Will the gentleman from Maine indicate what time the other side of the House desires for the discussion of this bill or what programme he would see followed with reference to it?

Mr. REED, of Maine. It is not any part of my business to furnish "programmes" for the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINDLAY. Well, I did not suppose it was any part of the gentlemen's business; but he seemed to be taking a very earnest and active part in this discussion; and I want to say to him, in the spirit of perfect courtesy, that if he will indicate how much time he wishes for the discussion of this bill and what the object is with reference to its discussion I shall not stand in the way of any such discussion.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suppose the proper course would be to refer this bill, like all others, to a committee; and the moment the committee reports it I have no doubt it will receive the approval of the House.

Mr. FINDLAY. Then the gentleman wants the bill referred, as I understand, and wants the delay incident to the reference.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Not at all.

Mr. FINDLAY. That is what I do not want.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I am not seeking delay or anything of that sort. So soon as the Speaker appoints the committees the bill can go right on.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRISON. If this bill is up for consideration——

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORRISON. If the bill is before the House I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House. It is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] withdrew his objection to the call of States for the introduction of bills.

The SPEAKER. He did; but the objection was immediately renewed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] and other gentlemen.

Mr. LOWRY. I move, then, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. LOWRY. I withdraw the motion temporarily for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] to introduce a proposition.

C. H. MANN.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that one of its employés, who at the last session was employed as a messenger in the press reporters' gallery, has been unintentionally placed in a position where he can receive no pay from the 5th of March to the first Monday of the present month, and I ask for the reading of a proposition to the House authorizing him to be paid.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let it go the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is suggested the matter should go to the Committee on Accounts. It is so well understood that it is hardly necessary. This gentleman was put on furlough when the Doorkeeper died, so he was not properly appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the joint resolution which it is proposed to introduce.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 5) authorizing the payment of C. H. Mann, messenger to the reporters' gallery.

Resolved, &c., That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to C. H. Mann the salary provided in the act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, as messenger in the reporters' gallery from July 1 to December 7, 1885, inclusive.

Mr. REAGAN. The clerk of the Committee on Commerce, who has an annual salary, resigned to accept a clerkship under the President just at the adjournment of Congress. I had no authority to appoint his successor because Congress had ceased to exist, and if I had, in my judgment it would have been unjust to the Government to tax it for a clerk for whom there was nothing to do.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will consent to let the joint resolution go to the Committee on Accounts when appointed.

There was no objection, and it was read a first and second time, and so referred.

WIDOW OF LEANDER A. ROBB.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution directing the payment out of the contingent fund of the House to the widow of Leander A. Robb, late an employé of the House; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask by unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the bill which I ask to be read as well as the papers accompanying it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making an appropriation of money for the relief of the Department of Justice.

Be it enacted, &c., That to enable the Attorney-General to employ additional clerical force in the Department of Justice, and for the purchase of furniture necessary for the building of that Department to facilitate the examination and preparation of French spoliation claims to be submitted to and considered by the Court of Claims, $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be drawn upon the warrant of the Attorney-General. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect from the passage thereof.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1885.

SIR: It has been assigned to me to resist on behalf of the Government the prosecution of the "French spoliation" claims in the Court of Claims under the act approved January 20, 1885; but this Department has not afforded me the requisite facilities or assistance necessary to the prompt and proper discharge of that duty; nor can it do so, as I am informed and believe, without authority from Congress. Petitions have been filed in 535 cases up to this date, and they are rapidly coming in; and with most of them accompanying papers have also been filed. I have copies of the papers in each case separately jacketed, and have been promised a press by the chief clerk in which to put them, but have no suitable place to put the press.

My colleagues, Messrs. Dewees and May, engaged with other matters, and myself are all crowded into one room, and it is not infrequently necessary for some one of us to take depositions there for want of room elsewhere.

I need not suggest to you that the presence of attorneys and witnesses and in the midst of the loud talking incident to taking testimony is not a suitable place for the careful examination and consideration of legal questions and the preparation of important cases.

In some of these French spoliation cases the printed record on the part of the claimants at this time aggregates twenty printed pages, each page of which must be carefully read and considered. From the best information I have there will be in all about 1,500 of these claims submitted to the court.

The liability of this Government to pay the valid claims upon the Government of France contemplated by the act referred to involves the consideration or two treaties prior in point of time to January 1, 1800, and four treaties since that date.

A large accumulation of papers, bearing on these subjects, is on file in the State Department, some of them in the French language.

That Department gives it out that it has not sufficient force to do the necessary translating, copying, or printing.

To examine and file copies of these petitions and accompanying papers as they come in, to examine claimants' pleadings and proofs, to hunt up and pick out matters for defense, which may, and probably will, require personal inspection of papers in the State Department, to superintend the taking of such testimony in different States as some of the claimants desire to have taken, to carry on the necessary correspondence incident to the conduct of the defense, to prepare a request for finding and brief for the defense in each case, and to argue orally before the court questions of novelty and difficulty as they may arise and to "resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses," as required by Congress—all this, I respectfully submit, is more work than any one man can do.

I beg to suggest that whoever may have charge of the defense in these cases should have a separate room, and should have the aid of at least one energetic competent assistant now, and that provision should be made for increased assistance as cases accumulate and the work increases.

The claimants in these cases are naturally anxious to have them disposed of as soon as may be, and I have sought by diligent labor to mature a line of defense and to submit some test cases early in the ensuing year—say by March 1. That this may be done it is necessary, if Congress shall give any relief at all, that it be given before the holiday recess.

I have the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

B. WILSON, Assistant Attorney.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

Mr. BOUTELLE. All through the last Congress——

Mr. DUNN. Regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing)—— the Democratic side of this House professed to be investigating what they proclaimed to be the extravagance of the Department of Justice. I think this can wait until Monday next.

Mr. TUCKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has objected to its introduction.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I object to its consideration, except in accordance with the regular order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, to Mr. DIBBLE, for five days, on account of sickness in his family.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, to Mr. SADLER, until January 5, 1886.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BUCHANAN: Petition for the improvement of the harbor of Atlantic City—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of wholesale grocers of Peoria, Ill., with reference to tariff duties on sugar—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Isaac Mann, for pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 21, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, recommending the passage of an act granting Joseph Rawicz, United States consul at Warsaw, Russia, permission to accept decorations from the Russian Government; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act approved July 5, 1884, reports of engineer officers as to the bridges and other obstructions that interfere with navigation; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. CONGER, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Cleveland, Ohio, praying the purchase by the United States of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John G. Kennedy, and others, citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the adoption of certain methods to secure cheaper and superior gas for fuel, power, and light; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAXEY. I present the petition of the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War, by their president, J. W. Denver, and their secretary, A. M. Kenaday, praying that a pension may be granted to the surviving soldiers of that war and the widows of those who are deceased. I move that the petition, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Pensions, and I wish to say that this being an association of old men, highly respectable, who served their country well, I should be glad that the petition be printed for the use of the Senate, not in the RECORD, but as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to print a petition with reference to pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that when statements on the other side of the Chamber are made on the presentation of papers we can not hear anything on this side. They should be read by the Chief Clerk, so that we may understand them.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated the substance of the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks that the matter be more clearly stated.

Mr. CONGER. I simply say that in the noise I could not even hear the subject-matter of the petition.

Mr. MAXEY. The petition I have presented is that of the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War. The purpose of it is to secure a pension to the surviving soldiers of that war, and to the widows of those who are deceased. I said that the petition was that of a highly respectable body of citizens, who have served their country well and are old men, and I asked that it be printed, not in the RECORD, but for the use of the Senate as a document. It embodies a great many important facts. I will state that I do not introduce a bill to accompany the memorial for the reason that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has already presented and had referred a bill on that subject, but the petitioners present the form of a bill which they ask may be considered by the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Pensions, and the order to print will be made unless objection be interposed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, presented a petition on behalf of the Wichita, Caddo, and affiliated tribes of Indians, praying for such legislation as will authorize the President of the United States to make an agreement with them in regard to certain matters of complaint that they have; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of J. C. Tilson and other citizens of Polk County, Florida, praying the forfeiture of land granted by Congress to the State of Florida for the construction of a railroad from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay, Florida, and that the settlers upon such lands may be allowed to enter them under the homestead or pre-emption laws; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BUTLER presented the memorial of the grand jury of the western district of South Carolina to the presiding judge of the United States district court, favoring the erection of a public building in the city of Greenville, S. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LOGAN presented resolutions adopted by the Millers' State Association of Illinois, favoring the passage of a bill regulating interstate commerce; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by George H. Thomas Post, No. 5, Grand Army of the Republic, Chicago, Ill., and a petition of Acker Post, No. 21, Grand Army of the Republic, Saint Paul, Minn., praying Congress to purchase a picture of General George H. Thomas, painted by a member of the former post; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of Philander C. White, of Concord, Mass., late a private in Company D, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, praying for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Louisiana Education Society, praying temporary national aid to the public schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Harriette R. Shattuck, president of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, and other citizens of Massachusetts, praying Congress to submit to the States an amendment to the Constitution which shall secure the ballot to women; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Theophilus Fisk Mills, sculptor, of Washington, D. C., praying compensation for a plaster mold of the face and measurements for an equestrian statue of the late General J. A. Rawlins; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, to report the same favorably and without amendment. I give notice that immediately after the holidays, which I suppose we must attend to first, I shall endeavor to ask the Senate to act upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 133) to fix the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Indiana, to report it adversely and ask its indefinite postponement, as we have already reported from that committee a general bill covering the case.

Mr. VOORHEES. What is the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I will explain to my colleague that it is a bill introduced by me increasing the salary of the judge of our district to $5,000. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported a general bill raising the salaries of all district judges to $5,000, and therefore this bill may be disposed of.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOAR. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, to report an original bill on the subject. It is substantially the bill referred to the committee, but I report it in the form of an original bill.

The bill (S. 714) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. It would not of course be worth while to attempt to bring up the bill to-day, but I give notice that as soon as it is possible after the holidays I shall ask the Senate to consider it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 580) granting a pension to Julia D. Grant.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing that when the two Houses adjourn on Monday, December 21, 1885, they stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1886.

The message also announced that that House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 2) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1885, on the 21st day of said month; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 715) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation, situate in the State of Nebraska, of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indians Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 716) to establish an additional land office in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 717) to provide for the organization of all that part of the territory of the United States now known as the Indian Territory and the "Public Land Strip" into a Territory, to be known as the Territory of Oklahoma, to provide a temporary government for the same, for the allotment of homesteads to the Indians in severalty, and to open unoccupied lands to actual settlers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. DAWES. The bill should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests the reference of the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suppose the proper reference for the bill would be to the Committee on Territories, as it provides for a Territorial government for that Territory, a part of which has some lands belonging evidently to the United States.

Mr. DAWES. The question whether those lands belong to the United States has always been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs heretofore, and upon that they have made reports at several times. The question whether the Indian Territory should be thus invaded and in the center of it a Territorial government formed it seems to me should be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not see why the Committee on Territories should take charge of the Indian reservations. If they are to do so, it will relieve the Committee on Indian Affairs of a very large share and a very difficult and laborious part of their duty, and it had better be surrendered at once and not by piecemeal.

No element of consideration enters into the propriety of the passage of such a bill (of course I express no opinion about that propriety) which does not belong exclusively to the Committee on Indian Affairs. There is the relation of that Territory to the Indians, the Indians to the Territory, the title which the Indians claim to have in the Territory, and the effect of a Territorial government upon the Indians there, to whom it was by treaty set apart and by a treaty covenanted with the United States to be forever theirs. Why should the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the matters of the Indians have been committed heretofore, be relieved of the subject, and the Committee on Territories take charge of it simply because the word "Territory" has some application to that committee, while the subject-matter belongs exclusively to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move to refer the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. DAWES. I make that motion, but I do not want to antagonize the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Neither do I desire to antagonize the Senator from Massachusetts, of course. I have no choice about the matter. I presumed that it was a clear case, and therefore it might be as well that the bill should go to the Committee on Territories.

I will say to my friend that the bill carefully provides for the rights of the Indians. There is no attempt on the part of the bill, nor would there be on the part of any committee of the Senate, to strike down the Indians in their rights. The object was to get a solution of this vexed question, which must be solved in some way. That is imperatively demanded. I merely introduced the bill and suggested its reference to the Committee on Territories for that reason. I have no sort of objection to a reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I thought possibly it might go into the hands of the Committee on Territories, who can not be so much overburdened as the Committee on Indian Affairs; but still if the Committee on Indian Affairs will take charge of it and make a speedy report to the body, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. DAWES. I do not mean to criticise the bill or the motive of the Senator from Nebraska. I only suggested the peculiar relations of all that question to the Indians and to the matters which the Committee on Indian Affairs have under consideration. If the Senator does not object, I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VEST. I wish simply to remark, to the Senator from Massachusetts particularly, that there have been several of these bills introduced and they have always gone to the Committee on Territories. I do not belong to either committee. I am not now upon the Committee on Territories and I am not upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, but there have been within my recollection some five or six of these bills introduced in the Senate and they have always gone, without exception, to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the Senator from Missouri, from his knowledge of the peculiarities of the question, whether he does not think the Committee on Indian Affairs ought—I do not know whether they are quite capable of it—to consider all the matters connected with that Territory?

Mr. VEST. I heard only imperfectly the title of the bill. As I caught it from the reading, it is a bill to organize a government in the Indian Territory.

Mr. DAWES. A government with special reference to Oklahoma, as I heard it.

Mr. VEST. That has been the nature of the bills that have heretofore been introduced. As a matter of course they embrace, you might say, two distinct ideas. One is the formation of a Territorial government and all the details as to organization, and the other is as to providing for the rights of the Indians who are already in possession there. The question may be said then to be one a part of which should go to the Committee on Territories and a part to the Committee on Indian Affairs; but the primary object being the organization of a Territory the Senate has heretofore always sent such bills to the Territorial Committee. Of course nobody will question the ability of the distinguished chairman nor of any member of the Committee on Indian Affairs to deal with the question. I only speak in the interests of public business as to the precedents which the Senate has established.

Mr. DAWES. I have no desire to shrink from the question of establishing a Territorial government in the Indian Territory. My own opinion about it is that it must come in some way or other. It is a matter which has arrested the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and has impressed itself very much of late upon the attention of the committee; but there are so many things connected with the future of the Indians in that section, which can not be ignored in any Territorial government possible there, that I do think that if the Committee on Indian Affairs are to be held responsible at all for what is done with the Indians they should have charge of that matter.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the only object of the Committee on Territories is to take charge of the Territories of the United States, to provide for their organization, and recommend measures of law for their government. That is what the committee were appointed for. But if there is an Indian in such a Territory the bill must go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, apparently.

Mr. DAWES. The Territory of the United States, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CONGER. In a moment; the Senator has made his remarks. Now there is hardly a Territory in the United States but what has a good many Indians in it, and if the rule should apply in this case it should in regard to the management of all Territorial questions. My impression is that it would be a good thing to keep this succession of bills in regard to the Indian Territory before the Committee on Territories, because they have had charge of the examination of them for years. I do not see that it conflicts at all with the question which the Senator from Massachusetts proposes; but it is a doubtful question, and with all humility I might say for the Committee on Territories that they may not be able to cope with the Indian question which is involved in it, and I have no particular desire for myself, and I do not know that the chairman of that committee has, to take even what belongs to it if the Committee on Indian Affairs desires to encroach upon its jurisdiction. The subject has been for ten or fifteen years before the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on Territories in one way and another, and there has been no action as yet; and I was very happy to learn by the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that they had thought a little about the subject and were willing to take charge of it. In that view I make no objection to the proposed reference.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to say, in addition to what the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has said, that under a resolution of the Senate the Committee on Indian Affairs were instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, was necessary in regard to the relations between the United States Government and the Indians, and in the discharge of that duty went into that country, the chairman himself and myself among others, and made a very thorough investigation with a view to determine what legislation was necessary. The committee, therefore, supplied itself, by direction of the Senate, with the proper information, as I think, at least as I hope.

In respect to the Indian Territory I beg to say that it is sui generis. It does not bear the same relation to the United States as any other Territory whatever, and I think the proper committee to look into the affairs connected with the Indian Territory is the Committee on Indian Affairs. So I think the reference ought to be to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 718) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

CASE OF A. M. KEILEY.

Mr. VEST introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 17) relating to the appointment of Anthony M. Keiley as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary; which was read the first time at length, as follows:

Whereas the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and Austria-Hungary, which has been transmitted to the Senate by the President, shows that Hon. Anthony M. Keiley, of Virginia, was, on April 29, 1885, appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary; that on May 9, 1885, the Government of the United States was officially notified by the Government of Austria-Hungary that "the position of a foreign envoy wedded to a Jewess by civil marriage would be untenable and even impossible in Vienna," and on August 4, 1885, the Government of Austria-Hungary declared its determination not to receive Mr. Keiley as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the position assumed by this Government and the principles affirmed in said correspondence by the Secretary of State meet with our unqualified approbation.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States;" and, whilst sincerely anxious to maintain friendly relations with Austria-Hungary and all other governments, the people of the United States deny the right of any foreign government to assert against any citizen of this country disqualification for office by reason of his religious belief or that of his family.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is my purpose, unless some other suggestion should be made by a member of the Senate, to move the reference of this resolution, together with the President's message transmitting to the Senate this correspondence, to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make one or two remarks before I make that motion.

I take it for granted that if Senators have not read the correspondence they have had their attention attracted to it by the wide discussion in the public press upon the subject.

I prefer that the resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, because there seems to be a difference of statement between the Government of Austria-Hungary and that of the United States in regard to the understanding of the correspondence as it progressed.

In April last, as the Senate is very well aware, Mr. Anthony M. Keiley, of Richmond, Va., was appointed by the Government of the United States envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Government of Italy, and on the 3d day of April, I believe, that appointment was confirmed by the Senate. So soon as notice of the appointment reached the Government of Italy the Government of the United States was notified through the Italian minister in this city that for personal reasons the appointment of Mr. Keiley was not acceptable to the Kingdom of Italy, and it was stated in a perfectly frank and courteous manner that in 1871, at a public meeting in the city of Richmond, Mr. Keiley had made statements in regard to Victor Emanuel, the father of the present reigning king in Italy, King Humbert, which statements were exceedingly offensive to his son, who is now upon the throne. These statements were made in a public speech by Mr. Keiley in regard to the occupation of Rome by Victor Emanuel, the virtual imprisonment of the Pope in the Vatican, and the deprivation of all his civil power. It is not my purpose to discuss that address of Mr. Keiley or the subject-matter of it. He is a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and spoke, as a matter of course, from a standpoint which I do not occupy.

That speech was reported in the public press and conspicuously in the New York Herald. It reached the Kingdom of Italy, and the result, to make a summary of the whole matter, was that the State Department of the United States recognized the right of the Government of Italy to object to the reception of Mr. Keiley as a minister, and on the 28th of April Mr. Keiley on his own motion, resigned as minister to Italy.

Immediately afterward, on the 29th of April, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to Austria-Hungary, and the Austrian minister was notified of his appointment. On the 7th day of May Mr. Keiley with his family sailed from the port of New York, and on the 8th day of May the minister of Austria-Hungary transmitted to the Secretary of State a telegram received from Count Kalnoky, the minister of foreign affairs for Austria-Hungary, in these words:

VIENNA, May 8, 1885.

We regret the nomination of Mr. Keiley as minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to the imperial court and his sudden departure from America, as here, too, like in Rome, prevail scruples against this choice.

Please direct in the most friendly way the attention of the American Government to the generally existing diplomatic practice to ask previously to any nomination of a foreign minister the agrément (consent) of the government to which he is accredited.

You are therefore requested to earnestly entreat them that the newly nominated minister may not reach Vienna before our confidential consent to his nomination has taken place.

The position of a foreign envoy wedded to a Jewess by civil marriage would be untenable and even impossible in Vienna.

COUNT KALNOKY.

It will be noticed from this telegram that two positions are assumed by the Government of Austria-Hungary through its accredited minister of foreign affairs. One is that the custom prevails in diplomacy of obtaining the agrément or consent of a foreign government before sending a minister near its court. The second is that the position of a foreign minister wedded by civil marriage to a Jewess is impossible and untenable in the city of Vienna, in that kingdom.

Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, promptly responded to this communication by stating in the first place (and I shall not read his letter at length) that no such practice as that of securing first the consent of a foreign government obtained in this country. The Secretary of State denied emphatically in his reply that any such practice had obtained in this country as first obtaining the consent or agrément, as it is termed in diplomacy, of any foreign country to the accredited minister near its court, and he further states that upon an examination of all the precedents in the State Department no such instance has been found. To dispose of that position now it is only necessary to say that subsequently Count Kalnoky withdrew that assertion and admitted that the United States were not bound by a precedent which had obtained only upon the Continent and in European countries.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether he is informed that Austria has ever asked such an assent from us first?

Mr. VEST. I only say, and I quote from the letter of the Secretary of State, that he has found no such case; that he examined critically and closely the files of the State Department, and no such practice in any single instance has ever obtained in this country. We have accredited our ministers without consulting or notifying the government near whose court they were sent.

As I stated before, Count Kalnoky subsequently withdraws, I will not say that pretense but that assertion, and admits that the United States has never followed such a practice, and that it obtained only in European countries.

But as to the second point made in the communication from the Government of Austria-Hungary, it permeates and pervades the entire correspondence; it is affirmed directly and indirectly, over and over again to the end of the correspondence, namely, that the Government of Austria-Hungary can not receive Mr. Keiley because in plain language he is "wedded to a Jewess by civil marriage," and his position would therefore be "untenable and even impossible in Vienna."

Without reading the correspondence at length, for I do not seek to detain the Senate, I call attention to the appearance for the first time, June 11, 1885, of any additional reason besides that which I have read. Then Baron Von Schaeffer communicates officially to the Government of the United States a statement. Mr. Bayard in the mean time, as Secretary of State, I should say had distinctly and emphatically stated to the Government of Austria-Hungary that with the constitutional provisions existing in this country, with our traditional history, and with the unanimous and unbroken sentiment of our people upon the subject, the Government of the United States could not accede to the proposition or admit it for an instant that any citizen of the United States could be deprived really of an office to which he had been appointed by this Government, by reason of his religious opinions or those of any of his family; that it was the duty of this Government to state to the world that the corner-stone and foundation of our republican institutions was religious liberty to the largest extent; and when they assigned as a reason for refusing an American citizen otherwise acceptable and otherwise qualified to a position of honor, trust, or profit, it was an attack upon the principle on which our Government was based and we intended to meet it.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall be glad if what I conjecture shall turn out to be true——

Mr. TELLER. There is so much noise in the Chamber that it is almost impossible to hear either of the Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please come to order and suspend conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. HAWLEY. I got an impression from hastily reading the correspondence that probably the Austrian Government did not mean to say that there was any legal or high political objection to Mr. Keiley because of his having married a Jewess, but to intimate that socially it would be very disagreeable to him. Is not that justified by the correspondence?

Mr. VEST. I was about to refer to the point advanced by the Government of Austria-Hungary, and I will come to it in a moment.

In reply to the assertion of Mr. Bayard that this Government would not permit the Government of Austria-Hungary to make this objection—because, as a matter of course, it was simply a protest—Baron Von Schaeffer informed Mr. Bayard that he was instructed by his government to enter into no discussion on the subject of religious toleration, that the Government of Austria-Hungary permitted entire liberty of conscience, and then for the first time appears the allegation to which the Senator from Connecticut has referred, that the meaning of the Government of Austria-Hungary was that the position of an American minister who was wedded to a Jewess by civil marriage would be such as to deprive him of all social influence and diplomatic consideration at the court of Austria-Hungary.

In Austria-Hungary, as well as in the United States, the constitution grants entire liberty to all forms of religious worship. Our objections to Mr. Keiley's appointment as minister of the United States to the imperial court are founded upon want of political tact evinced on his part on a former occasion, in consequence of which a friendly power declined to receive him, and upon the certainty that his domestic relations preclude that reception of him by Vienna society which we judge desirable for the representative of the United States, with which power we wish to continue the friendly relations existing between the two Governments.

Mr. President, it is very obvious that, with the indirection of diplomatic correspondence and assertion, the Government of Austria-Hungary simply means to say that any gentleman who has married a Jewess can not obtain the position to which he is entitled in the court of Austria-Hungary or the society of Vienna, which is precisely the same thing, by reason of that marriage; that position has never been abandoned from the beginning to the end of the correspondence; it is the salient point throughout the whole; and subsequently acting upon that reason the court of Austria-Hungary rejected Mr. Keiley. These are substantially the facts as they appear from the correspondence.

I do not propose to detain the Senate by elaborating the questions of international law which are involved in this matter. They are very plain and very simple. If the Government of Austria-Hungary had simply contented itself with saying that it had personal objections, as did the Government of Italy, to Mr. Keiley, then the Government of the United States, acting as it did in the case of Italy, would have recognized the right of Austria-Hungary to have made the objection, and Mr. Keiley would have resigned, as he subsequently did resign, and as he had before resigned the Italian mission. But when the Government of Austria-Hungary put its rejection of Mr. Keiley on the ground that his wife entertained certain religious opinions, this Government was bound, in my judgment, by its constitutional provisions, by its traditions, and by the opinions of its people to assert respectfully but firmly to that foreign government that we can not for one instant admit the justice of any such objection to an American citizen.

I speak frankly and perhaps earnestly because the great political leader in whose doctrines I believe, in whose public life I feel an especial pride, is peculiarly the author of the doctrine of religious toleration in the United States. It is a singular fact, but nevertheless a fact, that, out of the thirteen colonies which achieved independence from the British Crown, prior to the revolution there were but three that admitted liberty of conscience to its fullest extent, and those three colonies were Rhode Island, Maryland, and Pennsylvania. In the others there were statutes for a number of years of a stringent—I was about to say barbarous—character, including Virginia and some of the Southern States, against the right of any citizen to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, but he was compelled to abide by the dictates of the established church. Mr. Jefferson, in his autobiography, written when he was seventy-seven years old, gives a graphic account of the condition of affairs in Virginia when he returned after writing the Declaration of Independence. He found the established church with a licentious clergy, who were simply adjuncts of the great houses where high play and old Madeira rewarded complaisant ministry.

The first act of Mr. Jefferson when he left the Continental Congress and became a member of the Virginia house of burgesses, was to attack the doctrine of the union of church and state, and assert the fullest right of freedom of conscience and religious opinion. In his autobiography, written when he was seventy-seven years old, as I have stated, he says this was the most terrible struggle of his long and eventful career. Against him were united all the great families of Virginia, almost without exception, and, more than all, the established church, with its ministers and laity, who resented his attack upon church and state as a sacrilege and as a personal outrage upon themselves. So terrible was the struggle that the enmities which it engendered pursued Mr. Jefferson through life and assailed his memory after death. Jefferson had been a member of the house of burgesses of Virginia, of the Continental Congress, governor of Virginia, minister to France, Secretary of State, Vice-President and President of the United States; but in the epitaph written by his own hands, to be placed upon the stone that marked his grave, were only the words: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence and of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and father of the University of Virginia;" and if there be one of these great achievements greater than the other, it was that which gave to every freeman upon this continent the right to bend his knee to the God of his own adoration in his own way. This principle, attacked now in this correspondence, is, as Mr. Bayard has properly said, sacred to every American citizen and the corner-stone of our institutions. I am glad that the Department of State has assumed this position, and I sincerely hope that it may receive the indorsement of both Houses of our national Congress.

Now, sir, I move the reference of this joint resolution, together with the message of the President and accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PLUMB. I think this correspondence and this whole occurrence illustrates more perfectly and fully what we accomplish by what we call our diplomatic service than anything else which has recently taken place; and I am unwilling that this resolution shall go to the Committee on Foreign Relations without briefly calling attention to it.

I think myself that there is no question of religious liberty whatever involved here. I think the key to all this situation is found in the letter of Baron Schaeffer to Mr. Bayard of the 11th day of June and the letter of Mr. Bayard to Mr. McLane, in which he himself interprets, I think, this whole discussion very correctly, of the date of May 27.

In the first place, Austria is the neighbor of Italy. Italy having declined to receive Mr. Keiley, Austria said in substance it would be an unneighborly act to receive him as minister; and in addition to that it was stated that because he had married a Jewess Vienna society would not receive him; and as Mr. Keiley's duties there would be wholly social, and as he could not get into society unless the Austrian Government took him in under its wing, and as it could not properly undertake this, and thereby do violence to the social code of Vienna, it therefore advised that he be left at home. Vienna society would not receive him, and his position would therefore necessarily be hampered and disagreeable, and they thought on the whole he had better not go there; and I think so too.

That that is the whole of it, appears from the letter of Mr. Bayard of the 27th day of May to Mr. McLane, in which he makes himself, I think, the only satisfactory interpretation of this whole correspondence. He is directing Mr. McLane to interrupt the progress of Mr. Keiley toward the Austrian dominions, and goes on to say:

The Austrian minister communicated Mr. Bayard's note to his government and nothing further had been heard from him. It was not understood that the Austrian Government distinctly refused to receive Mr. Keiley for the reasons stated, but it holds out the threat of social ostracism, which would make the position of the minister painful and perhaps untenable.

It was purely and solely and only, according to Mr. Bayard on the 27th of May, a social question. That is exactly what it remains now; and it is a social question, because the only duty performed by our minister at the Austrian court, as I presume also the sole and only duties of our minister at any court, are social duties. I am glad, therefore, that this case has arisen, not because a good man has been deprived of the salary of a good office, but because the attention of the country has been called to the fact that we pay a large sum of money to keep up a service which is purely ornamental. I say "ornamental;" I can not even say so much as that. If what I have heard about the attire of the people whom we send abroad, and their general performance at the various capitals to which they are accredited be true, then, to "my untutored vision," I should think they were not even ornamental; certainly they would not be edifying west of the Mississippi River. In the letter of Baron Schaeffer to Mr. Bayard of the 11th of June the matter is set out distinctly as follows:

In Austria-Hungary, as well as in the United States, the constitution grants entire liberty to all forms of religious worship.

Nothing can be more emphatic than that. I believe that to be true, and that is stated for the purpose of setting forth distinctly that no religious question was involved in this refusal to receive Mr. Keiley.

Baron Schaeffer continues:

Our objections to Mr. Keiley's appointment as minister of the United States to the imperial court are founded upon want of political tact evinced on his part on a former occasion, in consequence of which a friendly power declined to receive him—

In other words he had made such utterance as would make his presence offensive at Rome, and Austria, desiring to keep on the good side of Italy and remain in that neighborly frame of mind which the contiguity of their borders naturally enforced, did not want to receive him and thought it best he should not come—and upon the certainty that his domestic relations preclude that reception of him by Vienna society which we judge desirable for the representative of the United States, with which power we wish to continue the friendly relations existing between the two governments.

In other words, in plain English, Mr. Keiley was appointed to perform some social duties about the court of Vienna, and he could not do these unless the Austrian Emperor should receive him at the "drawing-rooms" at which the nobility and others of social standing are received, because the people who have that standing would not associate with Mr. Keiley. This seems, of course, a little bit harsh in this country, where there is no social distinction of the kind here set up—except at one hotel, I believe, at Saratoga. I think there is perhaps at Saratoga a hotel where a social distinction of this kind is recognized; but as a general rule it is not recognized, and it seems a little hard generally. I am told, too, that some gentlemen who have come over on this side in an official capacity, with domestic relations which were not of a kind that were in vogue anywhere in this country, except possibly in the limited area of the Salt Lake Valley, have felt a little bit put out that we did not think well of those social relations; and there have been some intimations, I have understood, at times rather plain, that persons who came in that way could not be expected to participate, very extensively at any rate, in the social ordinances of Washington.

I think, with the Senator from Missouri, the reason was not a very good one—that is to say, judging it in a large way; but the reason was not what Mr. Bayard argued so strenuously and so very well, and nothing could have exceeded the ability of the disquisition which he has put forth in this correspondence upon the subject of religious liberty, in which I entirely concur; but it is wide of the mark. No such subject appears in the correspondence in any way, except as he himself put it in.

But I am reminded that I have heard some of my legal friends say at times that there is very often a good decision founded upon a very poor reason.

Shortly after this Mr. Keiley was appointed to Italy, and in anticipation of his going a dinner was given him at Richmond, at which he made a speech which was reported in the newspapers, and the last time I saw it it was made the subject of a cartoon in an Administration illustrated newspaper. So I am warranted in assuming that the report which I saw in more than one newspaper was correct. In that speech Mr. Keiley is reported as saying in the way of defending himself against what was then in the air as having been alleged against him by the Italian Government that he had substantially said of the Italian Government what he now said of the American Government, and that was that it was a government that was founded upon a gross and bloody violation of public right. Mr. President, when I read that I could not help thinking that that was not the kind of a person that ought to represent the American Government anywhere, even in a drawing-room, even at what my friend the other day felicitously described as a picnic. Certainly if anybody is going abroad to represent the sovereignty, the power, the purposes, whatever they may be, social or political, of the American Government, he ought to be a man who has no such opinion as that about the Government whose commission he bears; and so I would have said if I had been asked to decide this question myself as an individual, that while the Austrian Government had alleged a very poor reason, and one which by the lights I have about it seems entirely insufficient, that is to say, that this man had married a Jewess and consequently could not get in the society of the Austrian capital, I should have said that back of all that decision perhaps was a very good one, because as I believe he was not a proper person to represent this Government at Austria or elsewhere.

So when the Committee on Foreign Relations come to consider this question, as I hope they will, I trust they will give careful consideration to the question whether we need any minister at the Austrian court or not. I hope it will be found that this whole diplomatic service, which costs us a great deal of money, is an antiquated and totally unnecessary appendage, and recommend to the Senate that it shall be dispensed with in toto. I am not aware that the wheels of Government have moved with any less celerity and freedom from friction since Mr. Keiley was rejected by the Austrian Government, or that we have had during the very exciting times that have occurred in that neighborhood during the last few months any loud cry for anybody to represent American interests there during the Servian, Bulgarian, and Roumelian complications. Those countries have been contending by force of arms, and yet there has never been a suggestion, even from the exporters of American petroleum, or from any other source I have ever heard of, that anything was lacking in the representation which our Government had in that neighborhood.

I hope also the committee will go a little further and consider whether or not this controversy has not proceeded upon a false basis, whether, in fact, there is any foundation for any controversy whatever; and in the next place and fundamentally whether or not Mr. Keiley, or a man professing the sentiments which he is said to have uttered at Richmond on the occasion I have referred to, is a proper person to represent this Government anywhere abroad, or at home either, for that matter, estimable as he may be, and as I have no doubt he is.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Kansas be kind enough to cite me the letter to Mr. McLane?

Mr. PLUMB. It is found on page 11 of this correspondence, Executive Document No. 4, at the bottom of the page, telegram No. 6, Mr. Bayard to Mr. McLane, dated Washington, May 27, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the reference will be made. The joint resolution will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under the rule I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution of the House of Representatives on the subject of adjourning for the holidays. I think it will be a convenience to the gentlemen of the other House to know what the action of the Senate is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Monday, December 21, 1885, they stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 5, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. EVARTS, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate with Senate bill 459, Forty-eighth Congress, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of L. Madison Day be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims, there having been no adverse report thereon.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Richard C. Ridgway on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Claims, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, it was Ordered, That the papers in connection with Senate bill providing for the sale of the Fort Brady military reservation, in Michigan, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. TELLER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of J. J: Rockafellow be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Horace A. W. Taber be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of William M. Keightley be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, it was Ordered, That the papers on file relating to the claim of the legal representatives of Francis Guilbeau, deceased, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of James Crutchett on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the papers in respect to the bill for the relief of Rear-Admiral Samuel P. Carter be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Ordered, That the papers in respect to the claim of Henry S. French be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

STORES AND SUPPLIES OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate whether the Navy Department complied with the provisions of section 2 of the naval appropriation act of August 5, 1882, requiring an account to be taken of the stock of stores and supplies pertaining to the several bureaus of the Department, and an appraisement to be made of such stores and supplies; and, if so, to describe the manner in which such account and appraisement were made, and whether any part of the requirement of the law was not complied with, and whether or not the account and appraisement constituted an inventory of the stock on hand at the time they were made.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I asked a week ago for an extension of time in which the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce could make its report. I expected to be able to report to-day, but on account of one of the members of the committee being called home we have not yet quite concluded the report, and I therefore ask that the committee be continued until the 15th of January, within which time it shall have leave to make its report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks the consent of the Senate to extend the time of making a certain report until the 15th of January next. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

ALLOWANCE OF PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following resolution and asked for its present consideration:

Whereas it is stated in substance in the last annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions that under the administration of his predecessors, or some of them, in that office, other tests than those of the law were applied to applications for pension, and that applicants were required to show, in addition to service in the field, submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money is hereby directed to inquire into said statements and to report the facts to the Senate. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution lies over.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House joint resolution relative to the pay of the employés of the two Houses for the present month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 2) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1885, on the 21st day of said month; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 5) authorizing payment of C. H. Mann, messenger to the reporters' gallery; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 580) granting a pension to Julia D. Grant;

A bill (S. 118) for the relief of Alexander R. Lawton, of the State of Georgia;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents; and Joint resolution (S. R. 1) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

CUSTOMS FRAUDS AT NEW YORK.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance are hereby authorized and directed by themselves, or by a subcommittee, to investigate the frauds and abuses alleged to exist in the collection of the customs revenue of the Government at the port of New York, especially the subject of undervaluations of imported merchandise and the reappraisement of the same at said port; and that said committee, or subcommittee, have power to pursue such investigation and take testimony at such times and places as they may deem proper, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and compel the attendance of witnesses; and shall report the result of their investigation to the Senate, with recommendations as to what changes, if any, should be made in the customs laws in order to prevent frauds in the importation of merchandise and in the collection of the revenue from customs.

C. H. MANN.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 5) authorizing payment of C. H. Mann, messenger to the reporters' gallery, was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. That relates, I understand, to a correction of an appropriation made last year for an employé of the House of Representatives. It seems to be their own matter, and I suppose the Senate should consent to it; therefore I ask that the joint resolution be put upon its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to C. H. Mann the salary provided for in the "act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885," for the messenger in the reporters' gallery, from July 1, to December 7, 1885, inclusive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any explanation?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not examined it, but a member of the House spoke to me about it. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am under the impression from reading the debates in a place elsewhere that there is a question whether this gentleman is to have double pay or something of that kind, he having been appointed in another department. While I entirely agree that in ordinary cases each House should regulate such little matters for itself, I think this had better be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed to refer the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations. That order will be made if there be no objection.

NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report, together with accompanying documents, made to me by the board of management of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition held at New Orleans from December 16, 1884, to May 31, 1885.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 21, 1885.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the question of printing the accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Printing for examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

RAILROADS THROUGH INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of 17th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill to accept and ratify an agreement made by the Pah-Ute Indians, and granting a right of way to the Carson and Colorado Railroad Company through the Walker River reservation, in Nevada.

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 21, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 17th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill granting a right of way to the Jamestown and Northern Railroad Company through the Devil's Lake Indian reservation, in the Territory of Dakota.

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 21, 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 17th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs concerning the failure of the Utah and Northern Railroad Company to compensate the Indians upon the Fort Hall reservation, in Idaho, for lands taken and used in the construction of their line of road crossing the reservation from north to south.

The subject is recommended to the early attention and action of Congress.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 21, 1885.

TERRITORY OF DAKOTA.

Mr. BECK. I call up the resolution submitted by me on the 18th instant and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky on the 18th instant is before the Senate and will be read.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand that the Senator gave previous notice of a desire to address the Senate at this time on this resolution?

Mr. BECK. I desire to address the Senate in regard to it now, as I gave notice on Friday that I should.

Mr. HARRISON. I had expected this morning that the resolution in relation to the action of the people of Dakota would come before the Senate again for discussion, and had prepared to submit more remarks upon that subject in response to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but as the hour of 2 o'clock has been nearly reached now, the only time I could claim a right to use for the discussion of the subject, and as I understand the Senator from Kentucky has given previous notice of his intention to go on and I can not with propriety interpose an objection after 2 o'clock, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the resolution offered by him and also the resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] both be referred to the Committee on Territories. The Senator from South Carolina has expressed to me his acquiescence in that disposition of his resolution.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Then after the recess that committee will no doubt be ready to bring the subject before the Senate in the form of some bill that will offer for discussion the whole subject-matter, and not simply the single phase of it which has been presented in this preliminary discussion. While I preferred to proceed now that the remarks of the Senator from Missouri are fresh in my mind, I yield to the stress of circumstances this morning and propose that disposition of these resolutions.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not desire to discuss these resolutions, but I propose at some favorable time to add my mite to the historical part of this debate by a reference to the circumstances under which Oregon was admitted to the Union; but, inasmuch as Congress is about to adjourn now until the 5th of January, I shall not ask to submit what I desire to submit at this time, but will take occasion to do so when the resolutions are reported back or when some bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the resolutions respecting the Territory of Dakota be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HARRISON. The two resolutions—that of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and that of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to make a suggestion which I suppose will be for his convenience and that of the Senate? I understand the Senator from Kentucky proposes to address the Senate to-day.

Mr. BECK. I do.

Mr. HOAR. I have charge of the pending measure, the unfinished business, which is the district court salary bill. As I suppose it will hardly be worth while to take that up after the Senator has proceeded with his remarks, I should like to have unanimous consent now that that salary bill may be the unfinished business on the morning after the holidays, as it is to-day, and then let it go over so that it shall not be in the Senator's way at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill to which he refers (S. 6), fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and for other purposes, be considered as the unfinished business at the meeting of the Senate on the 5th of January next. If there be no objection, that order will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

COIN DUTIES ON IMPORTED GOODS.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BECK on the 18th instant:

Whereas the laws of the United States require that all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin; and

Whereas it is provided by section 3594 of the Revised Statutes that "The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows: First, to the payment, in coin, of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States; second, to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, direct; third, the residue to be paid into the Treasury:"

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether the laws above stated now are, or have heretofore, been obeyed; and if they have not, to report by bill, or otherwise, such measures as will secure their enforcement.

Mr. BECK Mr. President, no man will deny that the laws passed by Congress are as imperative on the highest executive official as on the humblest citizen, whether they approve them or not. I venture to assert that no man will contend that the laws recited in the preamble to the foregoing resolution either are now or have for many years past been obeyed. All sorts of excuses may be and have been offered for their violation, still the fact remains that the laws of the land have been disregarded by our executive officers, and the legislative power has been subordinated to the will of men whose duty it is to submit to them and to execute them as they exist. They have no right to decide whether a law is good or bad, politic or impolitic; so long as it is law they must be compelled to render implicit obedience to it. They have officially informed Congress for years past that they neither require coin to be paid for duties on imported goods, nor do they set apart the coin or its equivalent so received as a special fund to pay the interest on our public debt, or to procure bonds for the sinking fund. On the contrary, they admit that as the existing laws do not coincide with their views of what is politic they disregard them. I deny their right to do so, because I believe many of the evils the country is now afflicted with grow out of the disregard of the plainest provisions of law by our Treasury officials. I have no faith in the remedies which are now and have for past years been proposed for the evils they allege to exist. That the country is not as prosperous as it ought to be I admit, but I insist that the remedy is not to be found in striking down our silver coinage or the currency based upon it, but rather in requiring our public creditors to take it as the law and the contracts they required us to make demand.

I do not propose to find fault with much that is recommended by our executive officers; indeed, upon all questions, except that of coinage and the payment of our public debt, I heartily indorse what they advise. No Secretary of the Treasury has ever, in my opinion, expressed more enlightened views in regard to our present system of tariff taxation than the present Secretary, and I assume that he has but elaborated the views of the President. No more intelligent and statesmanlike message, taking it as a whole, has ever emanated from the Executive Mansion since I have taken part in public affairs; but I disagree with the President and his officials as to the management of our currency and our coinage, and I propose, respectfully but plainly, to state the reasons why, and to point out the remedy I recommend as a substitute for changes proposed in the message and official reports.

I believe that it can be demonstrated that gold and silver coin, and the paper representatives of both, stand on an absolute equality before the law, and that three-fourths of our present troubles grow out of the refusal of our officials to pay the money received at our custom-houses to our public creditors in the manner and for the purposes prescribed by the laws of the United States. Therefore I have recited these laws, which are plain and simple, in the preamble; and in the resolution have asked the Committee on Finance to tell the Senate whether they have been executed or not; and if not, to report measures which will secure their enforcement. I admit that even when that is done other combinations must be broken up before we can become a prosperous commercial people, but as all measures for tariff and tax reform must be originated at the other end of the Capitol, I am content to await the action taken there, being confident that the Executive is in full sympathy with all proper efforts in that regard.

There can be no dispute as to the fact that there must be something wrong in the management of public affairs when the ports of great nations like Germany, France, Austria, and other countries are arbitrarily closed against our cattle, hogs, and other food products, without, as the President tells us in his message, "present prospect of reasonable change." It is not a healthy condition of things when wheat, hogs, and other farm products, debarred from foreign markets in retaliation because of our protective tariff, sell at home for prices which will barely pay the cost of production. As to them certainly protection does not protect. The great American agricultural industries, which give employment to more than half of the workers for wages, whose welfare is held up (properly so) as the highest aim of legislation, and whose products constitute at least 80 per cent. of our exports, receive no real consideration here, and are not even ranked among the industries of the country over which Congress is asked or expected to throw its protecting arm.

These great interests are the unorganized, unequipped, and therefore neglected militia, whose strength can not be brought to bear with half the efficiency of a single regiment of thoroughly armed veterans, fighting for special interest. This is illustrated here and now by the zeal everywhere displayed by the combinations of bankers and bondholders and their able and well-paid press to maintain their bonds at a premium of 24 per cent., or rather to increase that premium to 30 or 40 per cent. at the expense of the already impoverished masses of tax-payers. It seems as though it was thought to be the duty of Congress to see to it that the rich should be made richer by making the poor poorer. Why should we be in hot haste to strike down our silver currency for fear of a fall in our outstanding bonds below 24 per cent. premium? Have the representatives of the people any interest in maintaining, far less in increasing, the premium on bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest beyond 24 per cent., when we must soon become the purchasers of them at any premium, or else contract our currency at ruinous rates by locking up in the Treasury all our surplus revenue, as reduction of taxation seems to be impossible, by the passage of laws which will still further depreciate the prices of farm products, now so low that producers can not raise them and pay wages to their laborers on which they can live?

When fat hogs sell at 3½ cents a pound, and other things in proportion, when all the world is combining to exclude our agricultural products from their markets in retaliation against our protective system, which prohibits our farmers from buying what they must have with the proceeds of what they must sell, unless they pay 46 per cent. on the average more than they are offered them for, in order to enrich a few organized combinations of manufacturers, who seek no markets abroad and refuse to sell their products in competition with so-called paupers with whom the farmers must compete, our condition is not satisfactory.

But I agree that the Senate can not inaugurate measures to relieve the country from oppressions of that character; therefore I propose to seek relief in the treatment of our circulation, not by destroying it, but by extending its usefulness. The present crusade against silver is only another evidence of the audacity of the organizations of wealth; they have always secured all they demanded, however unjust their demands; they have succeeded in alarming the President and the Secretary of the Treasury as they have done several preceding administrations; they threaten to use the power which our laws give them over our currency, of withdrawing from circulation among the people and, if need be, from the country the gold they control, and thus derange, even if ruin follows, the business of the people. Every concession increases their audacity and adds to their power. A stand must be made somewhere by the representatives of the tax-payers, or an absolute surrender of all the monetary interests of the country into their hands must follow. A mere reference to the past legislation of Congress on this subject proves what I say. When it was first asserted, in 1868, by the bondholders, as the time approached when the United States could lawfully pay off the 5-20 6 per cent. bonds, and when the outstanding principal of the public debt exceeded $2,600,000,000, that the honor of the country demanded that the principal as well as the interest on the bonds should be paid in gold or silver coin, a cry of indignation was raised all over the land against such a demand by all honest disinterested men.

They were told, and told truthfully, that all the bonds they held had been purchased with legal-tender notes at par; that for each $100 in greenbacks they paid to the Government they had received a bond for $100, bearing 6 per cent. interest, payable in gold or silver coin; that the greenback when they exchanged it for the bond was only worth 50 cents on the dollar in coin, and that it was an outrage in the face of the contract they had made, with the privileges given to many of them in addition as national bankers to have currency issued for them to loan out on the security of their bonds equal to 90 per cent. of the bonds deposited, to demand that the principal of their bonds should be paid in coin. They knew—everybody knew—that the claim was false. The legal-tender notes had and continue to have an indorsement on their back that "This note shall be receivable at its face value for all debts, public and private, except interest on the public debt and customs dues," so that there could be neither doubt nor dispute either as to the law or the fact. Nobody denounced the impudent demand of the bondholders more emphatically than the present presiding officer of the Senate [Mr. SHERMAN]. He said in his letter to a friend in 1868:

DEAR SIR: I was pleased to receive your letter. My personal interests are the same as yours; but, like you, I do not intend to be influenced by them. My construction of the law is the result of careful examination, and I feel quite sure an impartial court would affirm it, if the case could be tried before a court. I send you my views as fully stated in a speech. Your idea is, that we propose to repudiate or violate a promise when we offer to redeem the "principal" in legal-tenders.

I think the bondholder violates his promise when he refuses to take the same kind of money he paid for the bonds. If the case is to be tested by law, I am right; if it is to be tested by Jay Cooke's advertisements, I am wrong. I hate repudiation, or anything like it, but we ought not to be deterred from doing what is right by fear of undeserved epithets.

If under the law as it stands the holders of the five-twenties can only be paid in gold, then we are repudiators if we propose to pay otherwise. If the bondholder can legally demand only the kind of money he paid, then he is a repudiator and extortioner to demand money more valuable than he gave.

Truly yours,

JOHN SHERMAN.

Every word he said was true, and remains true to this day. The pledge is on the back of every greenback now that it shall be receivable, at its face value, for every debt, public and private, except interest on the public debt and customs dues. The men who demanded more were repudiators of the public faith and credit, as he truthfully and indignantly said. Mr. Stevens, then the leader of his party, denounced their claim still more fiercely, and threatened to abandon his party and join the Democracy, even with "Frank Blair" on the ticket, rather than countenance such an outrage on public decency.

The subsequent legislation by Congress only proves the truth of Macaulay's observation that if large pecuniary interests were concerned in denying the truth of the attraction of gravitation that most obvious of physical facts would be strongly and ably disputed.

It seems to me that any set of men who would deny the fact that the legal-tender note, indorsed as it was and is, which had purchased the bonds at its face value should be received again by the bondholder in payment of the principal of the obligation he held, would not hesitate to deny the truth of the attraction of gravitation.

Yet these men not only denied it, but in 1869 procured the passage of an act of Congress, against the vote and protest (I am happy to say) of every Democrat in both Houses, declaring that the principal of the bonds should be paid in coin—in gold and silver coin, as both are named. Legal-tenders were only worth 50 cents on the dollar in coin when the bonds were bought; they were worth from 66 to 70 cents when this act was passed. The act was simply legalized robbery. The bondholders and their attorneys in and out of Congress knew it, and knew that no court would sustain such a law. The indorsement could neither be erased nor sworn off the back of the legal-tender note, and nobody could plead ignorance either of the law or the fact that it was to be received at par in payment of the principal of all our bonds.

Therefore they caused the act of July 14, 1870, to be passed, extending the time of payment, reducing the interest, and exempting the new bonds in express terms from all taxation, State, Federal, or municipal; and to prevent all mistake or misapprehension as to the character, quality, and weight of the money in which payment of the new bonds should be made, they caused to be printed on each bond as part of its obligation, "that it shall be paid in coin of the standard value prescribed by law on the 14th of July, 1870. The present gold and silver coin are both of the standard value prescribed by the law of July 14, 1870, and were then as now both full legal-tenders for all our obligations. All the bonds that mature in 1892 and 1907, amounting to about $1,000,000,000, stand to-day unchanged, and payable as required by the act of 1870. The remnant of those payable now have been changed, the interest has been lowered, and the time extended, but the same provisions govern them, and the same conditions are written out as part of the contract in all of them. Let me read. Inscription on face of bonds of the 5 per cent. funded loan of 1881:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871," and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the first day of May, A. D. 1881, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of February, May, August, and November, in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Extract from face of United States 4 per cent. bond:

"This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the National Debt," approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

In the face of these facts it is simply absurd for anybody to assert that they are payable in gold alone, or that the tax-payers of the country are under any obligation, express or implied, either to demonetize or stop the coinage of the silver dollar, which is of the standard value required by the act of July 14, 1870, or to increase its weight thirty, forty, or any other number of grains, because England, to whom we have ignominiously surrendered the carrying trade of this country and the world, with her 200,000,000 of serfs in India and elsewhere, and Germany, after extorting $1,000,000,000 of gold from France, have combined in the interest of their money-changers to depreciate silver, or put up the market price of gold 20 per cent.

If the gold mines of California and Australia had continued to produce abundantly, and the Comstock lode and the Leadville mines had not produced silver, so that the market value of the two metals as bullion in London had been reversed, the argument could be made quite as plausibly that the silver dollar was the constitutional unit of value in 1870, which the bondholders have a right to demand.

There is not an outstanding obligation of the United States, nor of any State, municipality, corporation, or individual which can not be legally and honorably discharged by the payment of the present standard silver dollar. What right has Congress to deprive the debtor of that right by adding more silver to the coin than he agreed to pay, or by stopping its coinage so that he can not obtain it? It is as palpable a violation of a contract to increase the obligation of the debtor as it is to impair or reduce the standard value of the coin which the creditor stipulated in his contract should be paid to him. When Congress has once coined money and regulated the value thereof, and contracts are based upon it, the right to pay according to its terms can not rightfully or justly be taken from the people, and Senators and Representatives who deprive them of that right will have unpleasant explanations to make to the men whose burdens are increased by their vote. It is simply an attempt to repeat the legislation of 1869, and the same pretenses are made now that were made then. An honest dollar for the laboring man was then, as now, held up as the patriotic object of those who repudiated the greenback, as higher wages to labor is claimed to be the prime object of all the patriotic combinations of monopolists and machine-owners, who tax us all 46 per cent. under the present protective tariff and yet hire the cheapest pauper labor they can import. It is the wolf guarding the lamb, the spider the fly, and the hawk the sparrow.

I propose to test this question in the light of the facts furnished us by our Treasury officials. We are, of course, as good judges of the value of the facts they furnish and as competent to draw correct conclusions from them as they are. The last report from the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, relative to our foreign commerce for the fiscal year 1885, proves that there is no such condition either in our trade or exports of metals, whether of coin or bullion, as to render it necessary to strike down our silver coinage. It shows (page 1) that our total exports for 1885 were $726,682,946, and for 1884, $724,964,852, while our total imports for 1885 were $577,527,329, and for 1884, $667,697,693.

It will thus be seen that while the value of our exports in 1885 exceeded those of 1884 our imports were more than $90,000,000 less. The same report shows that for 1885 our exports of gold were $8,477,892, and for 1884, $41,081,957, or over $32,000,000 less for the last fiscal year than for the year before. Our exports of silver for 1885 were $33,750,633, and for 1884, $26,051,426, or nearly $8,000,000 more last year than the year before, while our imports of gold last year exceeded those of the year before nearly $4,000,000. These facts falsify the clamor that gold is fleeing from our country, and proves that all the (pretended) evils of a single depreciated silver standard are myths.

Nor is it true that our silver coin has depreciated since July, 1870, when tested by any other standard than the market value of bullion in London.

The report above referred to (pages 5 and 6) gives the New York or export prices in currency of the commodities which constituted over 80 per cent. of our exports, nearly all agricultural products in 1870 and 1885; from which it will be seen that the silver dollar, which it has become fashionable to malign and denounce in aristocratic circles, will now purchase from 25 to 30 per cent. more of all that the toiling millions of this country labor to produce, and of all that men need money to obtain, than it would in July, 1870. To avoid all dispute as to these facts I quote the language of the report, as follows:

The following table shows the annual average export price in currency of the articles of domestic product named and for the years indicated:

Articles.		Year ending June 30—
		1870.	1885.
Indian corn	per bushel	$0 92.5	$0 54.0

In the face of these official facts and figures as to our trade, and exports and imports of gold and silver, and the comparative purchasing power of the silver dollar now and in 1870, I repeat: Why should it be stricken down, or its purchasing power further increased 20 per cent. by adding 40, 50, or any other number of grains to its weight? In other words, why should every producer and debtor have to give 20 per cent. more of the products of his labor to obtain either a new silver dollar or gold coin with which to pay his debts than he does now, when he is already paying his obligations according to the terms of his contract in a coin which will procure for its owner much more of all he needs than it would in 1870? It is only another phase of the constant struggle of the rich to grind the face of the poor, and of the favored few to enrich themselves by class legislation.

While no one can deny that every obligation of the United States and every contract within our own borders can be discharged honorably with the present silver dollar, we are told that our foreign obligations and relations are such that gold will be at a premium very soon, and we will be on a basis of degraded silver at once if we do not increase the weight or stop the coinage of silver; that all Europe is horrified at our stupidity or dishonesty, or both. Even England, whose gold is said to be used so freely to buy Senators and Representatives to vote for revenue tariffs against protection to monopolies called American industry, is held up now by the gold monometallists as an example worthy of all imitation; her financial policy is lauded as the perfection of human wisdom. Fortunately the official reports overthrow all the reckless assertions of the gold worshipers. The Register of the Treasury (see report for this year, page 4), shows that out of $1,071,460,262 registered bonds of the United States outstanding only $11,927,900, or a little over one-tenth of 1 per cent. is held abroad, and of those which can be paid before 1892, foreigners hold only $34,150, which is less than the interest on the money now lying idle in the Treasury for one day at 3 per cent. per annum.

These facts coupled with the fact that our exports of goods exceeded our imports $130,000,000 this year, and our imports of gold exceeded our gold exports $18,213,804, an amount greatly exceeding all our bonds held abroad, settle the question. The falsity of the clamor about foreign complications or gold premiums is made too apparent for any sensible man to be deceived by it.

The press is filled with articles day by day which seek to make people believe that all other nations have ceased to coin silver, and that we alone are stubbornly persisting in forcing it upon this country after it has been abandoned everywhere else.

I propose to disprove these allegations by officially stated facts. The Director of the Mint in his last report shows (pages 131, 132) that for the year 1884 the world's production of gold was $95,292,569; of silver $115,147,878; and that $99,459,240 of gold was coined, while the coinage of silver last year amounted to $90,039,443, of which the United States coined $23,991,756 of gold, and $28,534,866 of silver. Other nations, therefore, coined in 1884 $61,504,577 of silver, showing that we are far from being alone in the coinage of that metal. England coined $3,204,824 of silver last year and $6,201,517 the year before, to add to her stock which has been accumulating for generations; while she has coined silver for India in the last three years to the value of $68,234,000.

The workers for wages in England to-day get their pay in silver coin, and the question is never mooted by them as to the comparative bullion value of the silver and gold coin of that country. Even Germany, notwithstanding she pretended to have demonetized silver twelve years ago, coined in 1882 $6,407,157 of it to add to her vast stock on hand; her laborers are paid in it now. No complaint is made anywhere, here or in Europe, about silver coin except by the holders of our bonds, who seek to increase largely the purchasing power of gold, or, which is the same thing, reduce the value of all our property from 25 to 50 per cent. below its present value when tested by the single standard of gold, which they claim shall be paid by us to them and to them alone. They do not seek to establish the single gold standard, they say; they are bimetallists. They agree that silver is a legal tender for all debts and obligations of the Government, except those held by them. It is good enough to pay the laborer, the soldier, the sailor, in short, all who work for the United States, but they insist that it is dishonest in us to pay it to them, although their bonds and obligations all show on their face that it is a legal tender in payment of them all so long as it is coined of the standard value fixed by law, July 14, 1870, as it is now and always has been.

Our dollar is more valuable than that coined by most of the other leading nations, France included, theirs bearing the relation of 15½ to 1 with gold, while ours is 16 to 1. I need not repeat in detail what the official reports show in regard to the gold, silver, and paper currency of the several countries. It is sufficient to prove by them that while the difference in the market value of gold and silver in London operates to degrade their silver coin more than it does ours, France and other countries maintain their silver and paper in all transactions, public and private, at par with gold under far greater difficulties than we have to contend with, no matter from what standpoint the comparison is made.

The Comptroller of the Currency is his last report, page 26, says:

> From information communicated to the State Department by the minister of the United States to France, it appears that notes of the Bank of France are legal-tender, and are redeemable at sight, either in gold or silver 5-franc coins, at the option of the bank (silver coins of smaller denominations being legal-tender only to the extent of 50 francs).
> On October 1, 1885, as shown by the returns of the Bank of France, the notes in circulation amounted to 2,786,051,930 francs, the bank holding at that time cash amounting to 2,265,636,853 francs, of which 1,162,987,434 francs was gold and 1,102,649,419 francs silver.

It will be observed that the Bank of France alone holds more silver coin than the total silver coinage of the United States. Up to July 1, 1885, we had only coined 203,000,000 of silver dollars. The silver coin in the Bank of France, at five francs to the dollar, amounts to $220,529,884, or over $17,500,000 more than our total coinage. How many millions more are in the hands of her people I am not advised—more, perhaps, than are held by the Bank of France, yet they are all a full legal tender and all as good as gold. France is little more than two-thirds as large as the State of Texas; her internal trade and commerce is a mere bagatelle compared with that of this almost boundless continent; her population is not two-thirds as large as ours and far less enterprising; her foreign commerce is much smaller than ours; gold can be transported from the Bank of France in Paris to the Bank of England in London in a few hours; they are not as far apart as New York and Washington. Why is it not done? Why is she not brought to the so-called degraded silver standard? Five more years of coinage of silver at the present rate will not bring ours up to hers either in volume or proportion to gold. Simply because her officials and her public creditors sustain her silver and do not repudiate it nor seek to degrade it as ours have done for years past and still continue to do in violation of the plainest provisions of law.

As I have stated in the preamble to my resolution, our customs dues are made payable in coin, and section 3694 Revised Statutes provides that—

The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows: First, to the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States; second, to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, &c.; * * * third, the residue to be paid into the Treasury.

No Secretary of the Treasury can mistake his duty under that law; no public creditor can complain when the interest on his bond is paid in the coin which is set apart as a special fund, first for the payment of the interest due to him. Yet millions, hundreds of millions, have been paid for duties on imported goods since 1878 in silver coin and silver certificates, which is only a convenient form of handling silver, as the coin they represent is ours when the certificates are paid to us; yet not one dollar, so far as I am advised, has ever been paid in silver as interest on the public debt or in the purchase of a single bond for the sinking fund, though it has been recognized as a coin which constituted the special fund created by law by its acceptance in payment of duties on imported goods. The public creditors have unjustly demanded gold for the interest on their bonds without any semblance of right, and every Secretary of the Treasury has disregarded the law and acceded to their demands. Our officials have thus aided and abetted the organization of the most powerful body of capitalists in the United States against silver coinage; men who control the currency of the country and hold the obligations of all its business concerns; men who can inflate or contract the circulating medium on which all our commercial transactions depend; men who hold $737,742,850 of bonds of the United States maturing in 1907, on which they now demand a premium of 24 per cent., and seek by striking down silver still further to increase their premiums.

They hold also $250,000,000 of our bonds payable in 1892, which they seek to enhance the value of even beyond the 12 per cent. premium they now command. These men control boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and the best talent of the press; they can crush all who are in debt if they dare to dissent from or object to the demands they make; the reports of their conventions and speeches are laid before us with a parade and semblance of authority equal to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury or the message of the President.

I shall not be surprised if they dominate this Congress, but it will be after I have entered my protest against it and have given to the country my reasons for so protesting.

If the managers of the finances of France had treated her silver coinage as our officials have ours she would have been prostrated, financially, at the feet of England and Germany long ago.

Why have the holders of the dishonored trade-dollar been importuning Congress for years to give them in exchange for it a standard dollar containing 412½ grains, while it contains 420? Simply because one is a legal tender and will pay the debts of its owner, and the other will not. Yet tested by the bullion value the trade-dollar is worth the most. When our Treasury officials yielded to the clamor of the bondholders and violated the law by admitting their right to refuse silver received at the custom-house in payment of the interest or principal of their bonds, they degraded our standard silver dollar by depriving it of its most important function as a legal tender; and now, having captured the executive branch of the Government, the bondholders and their attorneys are besieging Congress to enforce their demand for gold alone in the settlement of their claims, all law, justice, and equity to the contrary notwithstanding, by striking down the silver of the standard value of July, 1870, which they then demanded and inserted in the face of every bond they hold as one of the coins in which the bonds should be paid. It is hard to do justice to their audacity in temperate language; I hardly think I am equal to the task, and will not attempt it. I can, however, get the facts before the people.

The last report of the Treasurer, page 35, shows that the receipts at the New York custom-house for the fiscal year 1885, were paid as follows:

United States legal-tender notes	$36,161,000, or	28.9 per cent.
United States gold coin	1,544,000, or	1.2 per cent.
United States gold certificates	42,779,000, or	34.1 per cent.
United States silver certificates	44,660,000, or	35.6 per cent.
United States silver coin	158,000, or	0.1 per cent.
Total	125,302,000, or	100 per cent.

It is fair to assume that the payments at the other custom-houses were made in substantially the same character of money. It will be observed that more of the customs dues were paid in silver and silver certificates than were paid in gold and gold certificates; all of it is by law a special fund which can not legally be paid or covered into the Treasury till the interest on the public debt is paid out of it, and the bonds for the sinking fund are purchased or redeemed.

These, together, required about $108,000,000, yet not a dollar of silver has been so applied; it is paid into the Treasury and held there, and a clamor is raised that it can not be again got into circulation. If the law was obeyed and the bondholders required to take the same proportion of silver dollars that the Government receives through its custom-houses, the bondholders would have no difficulty in getting them all into circulation; and when it is made their interest to maintain and support the silver they own we would hear no more about its being dishonest money. The Secretary says (page 14 of his report) that the balance in the Treasury has been increased from the 4th of March, 1885, to the 1st of November, 1885, $58,053,702.27, yet there has been no reduction of the interest-bearing debt (and that is the only debt that is a burden on tax-payers) since November, 1884, certainly not since March, 1885. The monthly reports show $194,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds then outstanding and precisely the same amount in November.

How is the surplus silver coin to get out of the Treasury if the Secretary refuses to pay it out for interest and refuses to call in the bonds which are now payable?

There is no more effectual or pernicious method of contracting the currency than by collecting by taxation a large sum in excess of the needs of an economically administered Government and locking it up in the Treasury. Every dollar needlessly taken from the tax-payer wrongfully deprives him of that much capital which he needs and labored to obtain, and when it is locked up the circulating medium which all the people want is wrongfully withheld from them. The thief who steals and squanders an unneeded surplus locked up in the Treasury vaults would inflict less injury on the country and its business if the money he stole was put in circulation, than a Secretary who holds and hides in vaults currency which the people want, and refuses to use it to pay the debts, especially interest-bearing debts, which the men who own this money owe. It is easy to raise a clamor about a surplus, but it will be more difficult to explain to the people why such vast amounts of the money they have been so heavily taxed to furnish is lying idle in the overloaded Treasury vaults, and they deprived of its use, while interest is running against them on bonds which can be and ought to be paid. The idle money when paid out for interest on bonds would at once be released and restored to circulation.

Speaking of circulation, we are constantly told that there is now a great abundance of it outstanding; indeed, we are officially advised that the legal-tender notes and the silver certificates should all be withdrawn—I presume because of the superabundance of currency. Let us look for a few minutes at the effect of these recommendations, if carried out, and see how far these certificates are now used as currency.

It was the avowed purpose of the advocates of both gold and silver certificates, and I was one of them, to furnish a safe, convenient paper currency, every dollar of which could be used just as the coin paid for it could be, and which would be secured by the deposit of an equal amount of coin in the Treasury. No better security could be asked or given. It was not thought desirable to have the coin of either metal exposed to the risk of loss or reduction of value by the abrasion which necessarily accompanies its active use. The transportation of both was known to be dangerous and expensive; all the expense and risk, as well as the deterioration of the coin, was avoided by the use of the paper substitutes, while the United States were sure to be amply compensated for all the expenses incurred for vaults, custodians, and everything else.

We—I mean by we all the people—received a coin dollar for every paper dollar issued. We only pay out the coin on the paper brought back to our agents. All of it that is lost or destroyed by fire, flood, or the thousand accidents that all transitory things are subject to, is our gain. We had experience in operations of that sort, and knew that they were profitable. Forty-five millions of dollars of fractional currency was issued. We afterward called it in for cancellation, and we now know that $15,000,000, or one-third of it, has been lost or destroyed. We made $15,000,000 out of that issue, as we received full consideration for the whole amount issued. We only redeem such national-bank notes as are returned; and the amount now known to be lost is so great that the Comptroller is devising all sorts of ingenious plans in his report to get it away from us for the benefit of the banks. None of them lost any of it. The people who borrowed it or worked for it, after the banks got value received for it, were the sufferers; yet the Comptroller wants it all for the banks. I expect they will get it. They have as much right to it as to have their interest and principal paid in gold alone or to have our silver stricken down. I have no idea that $300,000,000 of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks charged in the reports as outstanding could be returned if they were called in to-day. All lost is clear profit to the Government. It is a sufficient answer to all the clamor about expense and vaults that the coin is preserved from loss and from abrasion, and that our gain from the loss of the outstanding paper, if it is kept in denominations in which it will circulate, as it ought to be, will amply compensate the United States for all the expenses of its safe-keeping.

The object we all had in view by keeping in actual use paper substitutes for gold coin to the extent of the coin deposited has been grossly perverted. The coin is locked up, and four-fifths of the certificates issued are of such high denominations that they are of no sort of use as currency.

The Treasurer's report, page 23, shows that on the 30th of June, 1885, the outstanding gold certificates amounted to $137,760,860, of which all but $33,360,000 were in denominations of $500 and upward, more than $55,000,000 of them being for $10,000 each. It is obvious that the people get no benefit in the form of currency when bills or certificates exceed $100.

The Director of the Mint, on page 29 of his report, speaking of these paper substitutes, says: "As these certificates represent coin in the Treasury, which coin can only be used in their redemption, they really form a part of the active coin circulation of the country." The Director, perhaps, did not know that $55,000,000 of them were for $10,000 each, as it would be absurd to speak of such notes or certificates as forming part of our active circulation.

The Treasurer's report (page 24) shows that on June 30, 1885, silver certificates amounting to $139,901,646 were outstanding, and that $103,758,091 were in ten and twenty dolllar bills, in about equal proportions. None were higher than $1,000; so that the only real currency furnished to the people in the shape of certificates is that based on the deposit of silver coin. Yet the dollars so deposited are held up as useless incumbrances, performing no function of value, and all our officials join in the crusade against them and the certificates that represent them, and urge Congress to withdraw the one and stop the coinage of the other. I do not propose to do either unless better reasons are given why it should be done than any I have yet seen or heard. I would, however, amend the law so that no certificate should be of a higher denomination than $500, and not more than 25 per cent. of the amount outstanding at any time should be of denominations higher than $50. The legal-tender notes, too, are attacked. It seems as though every form of currency which costs nothing and enriches nobody is condemned.

It is assumed that the Government has no right to use its own credit or to furnish any part of the currency the people need. Legal-tender notes are denounced as a forced loan, as rag-babies, shinplasters, indeed every opprobrious epithet has been hurled against them by those who insist that they must be vested with the sole right to issue currency to loan at a profit to themselves, and to dictate through their organization how much or how little it is most profitable to them to keep in circulation. But the people and their representatives have so far sustained the greenbacks, and while they have always been repudiated to the extent that they could not be legally paid at the custom-houses for duties on imports, and that is the law now, over $47,000,000 of them were received for duties last year in New York alone by executive orders in plain violation of law. The majority of the Senate refused last year to make them receiveable for duties, and yet we permit $47,000,000 of them to be so received. I have a bill now before the Finance Committee making it legal to receive them for customs dues, as I believe they ought to be; yet I insist that no executive officer ought to be allowed to do anything in violation of law, or to be placed in a position in which he feels authorized or compelled to disregard it.

Congress by the act of May 31, 1878 (see Statutes at Large, volume 20, page 87), made an effort to retain what was then left of the legal-tender notes, and to preserve them in such shape that they would be currency in the hands of the people. We provided, in substance, that whenever legal-tender notes are received at the Treasury from any source they shall not be retired, but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation, and that new notes of the same denomination of those returned because too much mutilated for use shall be issued in their stead. It is obvious that Congress did not intend to allow any increase of the denomination of the legal-tender notes above what existed when that act was passed; yet the table on page 20 of the Treasurer's report shows that bills of the denomination of $500 have increased in the last year nearly $10,000,000, while those of smaller denominations have been proportionally decreased.

There can be but one purpose in this attack all along the line on everything except gold and national-bank notes, and that is to transfer to the holders of our bonds absolute power over the currency, which means over the business of the country.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency develops that purpose, perhaps, more plainly than the others. After insisting that Congress should repeal the tax on circulation, give up the profit made on the lost bank notes, or put it into a safety fund with other things for the benefit of the banks, he adds, on page 18:

> Such legislation would have the effect of maintaining bank-note circulation, and prevent its being superseded by Government issues, which an authority as high as Alexander Hamilton has said "are of a nature so liable to abuse, and it may even be affirmed so certain of being abused, that the wisdom of the Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an experiment."

I assume that it is too clear to admit of debate, no matter what Mr. Hamilton or anybody else said, that a circulating note, in any form, properly secured, is as good when issued by the Government as a like note would be when issued by a corporation created by the Government and secured by a Government bond; and hardly anybody but the Comptroller or a bank attorney would venture to assert that the Secretary of the Treasury is not as likely to be honest and careful of the public interest in maintaining and keeping the necessary amount of circulation afloat for legitimate business purposes as bank presidents would be, who are under no obligation to consult the public welfare, but, as the private interests of their stockholders demand, may contract or expand their issues as the one course or the other best subserves their private ends regardless altogether of the public weal; indeed, they are apt to be enriched when they can most surely oppress the masses.

Yet, in the face of his claim that all other circulation is unsafe, the Comptroller shows that the decrease in national-bank circulation in the last three years amounts to over $48,000,000, and says that it would have decreased $25,000,000 more if the Secretary of the Treasury had not come to their rescue by refusing to use the money at his command in the purchase of the 3 per cent. bonds on which their circulation is based; in other words, the people have lost over $2,000,000 of interest and the bankers have made $6,000,000 on loans by the operation. The Comptroller shows very clearly why the bondholders are so anxious to get clear of the silver dollar; they fear that the premium on their bonds will fall if they are paid in whole or in part in silver. But he stated the whole case so clearly that I will read, on page 15 of his report:

> It will be seen that the banks held on November 1, 1884, $155,604,400, and on November 1, 1885, $138,920,650, of 3 percents under the act of July 12, 1882, payable at the pleasure of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, during the year ending November 1, 1883, paid $105,634,150, and during the year ending November 1, 1884, $105,970,450 of the public debt. In the latter year 3 percents only were called. No bonds were called for the year ending November 1, 1885. Reasoning upon the theory that the public debt would, during the year ending November 1, 1885, continue to be reduced by the payment of 3 per cent. bonds, and that this reduction would occasion the reinvestment of trust and other funds invested in threes, and cause a greater demand for and consequent increase in the price of 4 per cent. bonds to a point at which it would be more profitable for the national banks to sell them, the Comptroller estimated in his last annual report to Congress, that unless legislation should be secured enabling the banks to issue currency at a fair profit, circulation would be reduced at the rate of at least $40,000,000 per annum. It is believed that this estimate would have been substantially correct had the Government continued during 1885 to call and pay the 3 per cent. bonds as rapidly as during the two previous years.
> The reduction of circulation of national banks during the year ending November 1, 1885, for reasons other than the call of bonds by which it was secured, was greater than anticipated. The causes which have led to this result are small profit remaining to national banks on circulation after paying the tax of 1 per cent. per annum imposed by the Government; reduction in the rates of interest throughout the country, occasioned by the abundance of money in the financial centers; and, doubtless, uneasiness among certain of the bankers of the country as to the outcome of the increase of silver in the Treasury, such increase indicating that possibly the interest on the public debt, and even some portion of the principal, might be paid in standard silver dollars, and that Government bonds might thereby become depreciated in foreign markets, which would undoubtedly affect their price in this country. The credit and standing of this country is deservedly high, and it is not believed that the people desire either the principal or interest on the bonded debt of this country to be paid in anything but gold coin or its equivalent.

I think the Comptroller makes it clear that the country can not afford to rely for its circulation on national-bank notes. He asserts that the bankers will surrender their circulation and sell the bonds upon which it is based, regardless altogether of the public needs, whenever they can make more money by selling the bonds than they can by loaning the circulation. We all know that to be true.

Can Congress afford to vest absolute power over the contraction and expansion of the circulating medium which regulates all our transactions exclusively in the hands of men who gamble with it for private gain without any sort of public responsibility?

I think not; yet, if we retire the greenbacks and the silver certificates, as our officials advise us to do, we will have no currency but national-bank notes left, which they can expand or contract at pleasure. Nobody pretends that in the reduction of these notes from $324,000,000 in November, 1882, to $276,000,000 in November, 1885, the public interests or needs were for a moment considered.

I desire to state with great distinctness that I am not making war on bondholders or national banks or bankers. I voted to renew their charters, to repeal all taxes on their capital and deposits, and will cheerfully vote for any and all measures necessary to add to their usefulness, either by increasing their circulation to par with the bonds deposited, or, if it can be done with justice to their competitors in business, reduce or repeal the tax on their circulation. But I would require them to take the same coins, both gold and silver, that all other creditors of the Government receive. I shall always oppose the grant or recognition of any superior rights or privileges in them or in the obligations they hold over those of other citizens. I would divorce them from politics, and deprive them of power to control or influence legislation by contracting or expanding or by threatening to interfere with our currency, as was done when they obtained President Hayes's veto on a memorable occasion. I would require them to obey the law and receive the coin which we take at the custom-house and set apart as a special fund for their security and payment. When we say by law, as we have done, that "no national banking association shall be a member of any clearing-house in which such (silver) certificates shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances," I would forfeit the charter of any bank that dared to disobey the law, as I would fine and imprison any officer of any of them who would certify checks when the funds were not actually in the bank at the time.

In short, no set of men should be allowed to exercise privileges prohibited by law, nor have rights given to them in regard to the character and quality of the coin in which their debts shall be paid which are denied to all other equally meritorious creditors; and no set of men should ever have power to regulate or control, as their private interests may be affected, the currency or the business of the people. If that power is yielded or conceded to them, with legal-tender notes and silver certificates withdrawn and gold paid to them, and to them alone, for their interest and bonds, Congress would be powerless to resist any demands our bondholders and bankers might make. I know their power and appreciate the adroitness with which they can have their claims presented. Even the President in his message has been induced to say that up to the present time only about $50,000,000 of the silver dollars we have coined have found their way into circulation. He modified that statement by showing that a large amount of silver certificates were outstanding.

But the press of the country has taken up the first statement, leaving out all the qualifications, and parade it before the country as conclusive evidence that too much silver has already been coined, and that all of it is an incumbrance except about $50,000,000. They utterly ignore the fact which the official reports show that at the close of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1885, out of a total coinage of $203,000,000, $140,000,000 in round numbers was in active circulation in the form of silver certificates, in addition to the coin in the hands of the people, of which certificates $44,660,000 was paid to the Government for customs dues during the last fiscal year at the port of New York alone—more than was paid in gold and gold certificates combined. Why is not the coin represented by these certificates as much in active circulation as if it was passed from hand to hand as often as the certificates are? I ask, is it fair to complain of the silver held in the Treasury as being expensive and useless, under such circumstances, and yet not utter one word of complaint in regard to over $137,000,000 of gold coin locked up, at the same time and in the same way, represented by the same sort of certificates, most of them in a far less useful form? If our officials would unlock the Treasury vaults and pay our interest-bearing debt with the money they are complaining of being overwhelmed with they would be doing their duty more satisfactorily than by the course they are now pursuing.

The President says:

A special effort has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the amount of our silver coin in circulation.

Let him make one more effort and pay out the $60,000,000 or $75,000,000 he received for customs dues, and which he has no use for, in payment of interest and in the redemption of the bonds now redeemable, and the ordinary expenses of the Government will keep the vaults reasonably clear of all, not represented by certificates or bills, which the people have a right by law to demand on making a deposit of coin. No public creditor other than the bondholder has ever complained when payment is made to him in silver or silver certificates. All other creditors are entitled to the same consideration as the holders of our bonds. We as a tax-paying people are not interested in keeping our bonds 24 per cent. above par when we must soon buy them with our surplus revenues.

I may observe here that silver certificates are now and have always been a popular currency.

The Treasurer in his last report, page 24, says:

The issue of silver certificates by Treasury officers in the South and West for gold coin deposited with the assistant treasurer at New York, under Departmental circular of September 18, 1880, was discontinued in January last. The amount which had been issued in that manner to the date named was $80,730,500.

The Treasury order referred to reads thus:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., September 18, 1880.

"Until further notice the United States assistant treasurer in New York will pay out at his counter standard silver dollars or silver certificates in sums of $10, or any multiples thereof, in exchange for like amounts of gold coin or gold bullion deposited with him.

"Upon the receipt by the Treasurer of the United States in this city of an original certificate of deposit issued by the United States assistant treasurer at New York, stating that there has been deposited with him gold coin or gold bullion in the sum of $10, or any multiple thereof, payment of a like amount in standard silver dollars or silver certificates at the counter of any United States assistant treasurer designated by the depositor will be ordered.

"JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary."

The Treasurer of the United States in his report to Congress dated November 1, 1880, says:

The demand for silver certificates under the circular of the Department dated September 18, 1880, authorizing their exchange for gold coin and bullion, has been quite extensive at New Orleans, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, and there were paid out at these points during the month of October $3,485,000 in silver certificates for an equal amount of gold coin deposited in the subtreasury in New York.

And in December, 1881, the Secretary of the Treasury in his report says:

The Department has issued silver certificates at the several subtreasury offices upon a deposit of gold coin in like amount with the assistant treasurer at New York, and through this means certificates have been issued for nearly all the silver held by the Treasury. These certificates amount to about $66,000,000 and are now outstanding.

That condition of things doubtless rendered the following order necessary, as all or nearly all the silver coin in the Treasury was represented by outstanding silver certificates:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1881.

Until further notice the exchange of silver certificates for gold coin deposited at the office of the United States assistant treasurer at New York will be suspended, and Department circular No. 75, of September 18, 1880, is hereby modified accordingly.

H. F. FRENCH,
Acting secretary.

Subsequently this restriction was removed for a time and over $80,000,000 of silver certificates were taken principally by the people of the South and West in exchange for gold coin. The privilege was finally withdrawn in January, 1885. I ask in view of these facts how it can properly be charged that the people will not use the silver coinage, that they are hoarding gold, that the depreciated paper will soon greatly impair the purchasing power of the poor man's wages, and that we are on the verge of a financial crisis unless we bring all our transactions at once to a gold basis?

It must not be forgotten that all the gold coin deposited for silver certificates became at once the property of the United States; it was not held in the Treasury for their redemption. An equal amount of silver coin took its place for that purpose at once. Men who owned gold all over the South and West, in Louisville, Indianapolis, Nashville, and other places, as well as those cities named in the report, sent their coin at their own expense to the assistant treasurer in New York in order to have silver certificates delivered to them for use as currency at home. Yet during all that time the bullion value of gold in London was at least 15 per cent. more than silver, and the country was being periodically alarmed, and Congress advised by our officials that gold was leaving the country, that silver was a degraded standard of value, and that its coinage must be stopped or its weight increased or ruin would speedily be upon us because of its depreciation in the London market.

The facts I have stated overthrow all the speculations of the theorists. Our business men gladly exchanged their gold coin for silver certificates and did not ask any better security for the paper they took than the silver dollar deposited in the Treasury. So far from hoarding gold because of its greater bullion value in a foreign market, they sent it to a distant depository to get the paper we are advised is dishonest money because it is depreciated 15 or 20 per cent. below gold in London. I have thus imperfectly outlined the reasons why I can not sustain at this time a policy which seeks to withdraw either our legal-tender notes, the silver certificates, or stop the silver coinage, and I see no propriety in increasing the weight of our silver coin beyond the standard value fixed by law in July, 1870, under and by which all our outstanding bonded indebtedness is regulated. I am convinced that we can no longer look with safety to the national banks to furnish the country with a stable currency.

I insist that every creditor of the Government is by law entitled to be paid in the same coin, and that our Treasury officials should be required to pay silver as well as gold when received for customs dues to our bondholders, as they do to all others who have legal demands upon the Treasury; that done there will be no need, at least for years to come, to strike down silver in any form. The country is now rallying from a long period of depression. All railroad securities recently fell 50 per cent. on the average in eighteen months. Wheat, cotton, cattle, hogs, all farm products, are even now so depressed that they leave no profit to the producer, even after he pays the lowest wages for which he can obtain labor in their production. Foreign nations are closing their ports against our leading exports and throwing all obstacles possible in the way of our commerce.

Our carrying trade is gone and is in the hands of our foreign competitors. We need to use all our resources of both gold and silver, and their paper representatives, to enable us to regain our lost prestige and to develop our resources in the most economical way. Contraction, or destruction of any part of our means is, in my judgment, fatal to our laboring and especially to our debtor classes. So believing, I am opposed to it.

Mr. President, I will only add that I have no interest in the silver question other than my conviction in regard to the best interest of the country. I never owned a dollar's worth of stock, directly or indirectly, in any silver or other mine. The people I represent here are not specially interested in it. We are in the central portion of this great continent, and our prosperity depends on the prosperity of every section. If hereafter I ascertain that I am wrong, and that the public good requires me to change my views, I hope I will have the courage to do so, and state the reasons therefor as frankly as I have given the reasons for my present convictions.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this seems to be a very elaborate assault upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States. If the resolution should pass, I take it it would be an expression of want of confidence in this Administration. I regret that the Senator from Kentucky should represent the Secretary of the Treasury as being little better than a common thief, and allege that the President of the United States and the Secretary together have been bought up by the bondholders. But as it is probable that no Senator upon the left is prepared at the present time to enter into a defense of the Administration, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, on Friday last I gave notice that I would to-day——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the question on the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky the Senator from Iowa asks——

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. On Friday last I gave notice that I should ask the Senate to-day to take from the table a resolution submitted by me on the 9th of December, and stated that it was my purpose to submit some remarks to the Senate touching the subject-matter of that resolution; but inasmuch as the day has progressed so far into the later hours I will not ask that action be taken now, but give notice that on the reassembling of the Senate on the 5th of January I shall ask that that resolution be taken up for the purpose indicated.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 2) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1885, on the 21st day of said month; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

FLORIDA PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit at this time a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators be, and are hereby, appointed, who shall be, and are hereby, charged with an investigation of all alleged unlawful, unauthorized, or fraudulent appropriations of the public lands of the United States in the State of Florida, to the detriment of actual settlers, or homesteaders, or purchasers for cash, or of the United States, under the several acts of Congress making grants of the public domain to the State of Florida and otherwise. And that the Commissioner of Public Lands furnish said committee with a competent clerk from the office of Public Lands. And that they have authority to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer. And that said committee report to the Senate the evidence taken by them and their recommendations on the subject.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, in offering the resolution it is not my intention to make or suggest either directly or indirectly any charge against any official either of the Federal or the State Government. There have come to me in the past twelve months numerous letters in which it has been alleged that there have been improper dispositions of the public lands of the United States in Florida to a large extent; and for the purpose of doing justice to the people who have made the charges as well as to allow an opportunity for refutation on the part of those who may be connected with them, I have thought it right to ask that the matter may be investigated by the Senate.

There has been a very large amount of the public lands of the United States appropriated under the several acts of Congress within the last few years, and there have been very great complaints on the part of homesteaders and other settlers of interference with their rights under the law by the locations that have been made. I think the subject is of sufficient importance to have the matter investigated by the Senate, and upon conference with members of the Committee on Public Lands they have some of them suggested to me that it would be better if it were done by a special committee of the Senate than by that committee, who are already charged with various important bills.

If there be no objection to the adoption of the resolution I will ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. It should be referred.

Mr. HOAR. Is there legal authority in the Senate to direct the Interior Department or a bureau in it to furnish a clerk for the use of the Senate?

Mr. CALL. I do not know in regard to that. It might be made a simple request if the Senator thinks there is any difficulty in that respect.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to interfere with the Senator's resolution, but I should think he had better give the committee the ordinary authority to appoint a clerk, and then if the chairman of the committee wants a clerk of special skill he can make the arrangement with the proper Department. Certainly we have no such authority as to direct the Department to furnish a clerk.

Mr. CALL. I shall have no objection to amending the resolution by inserting the word "request," but it was suggested to me by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior that there are some very well qualified clerks there who are familiar with the subject.

Mr. HOAR. I should object to having either of them as I am at present advised. I think the ordinary authority of a committee to appoint a clerk should be put in, and then the chairman can make any arrangement with a particular Department to furnish him a clerk that is lawful and proper.

Mr. CALL. I accept the suggestion, and ask the Secretary to amend the resolution by striking out that portion of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Florida will consent to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I have read with some interest the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and if I recollect correctly he does not confine his statements respecting the public lands to the State of Florida, but rather extends his comments to various portions of our country and intimates that there has been in divers places and in numerous States a misappropriation of the public domain through land grants and other violations of the homestead, pre-emption, and various other laws.

While I do not object to any investigation with reference to Florida, it seems to me that the resolution should go to the Committee on Public Lands and be reported back from that committee, so that if necessary the scope of the investigation may go beyond the State of Florida.

I know that a great many years ago there were numerous land grants made to the State of Florida for railroad purposes. I am not aware that there have been any recent grants made to that State, but I suggest to the Senator that the resolution should go to the Committee on Public Lands, from which committee it can be reported back in an acceptable form.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the Senator if it would not meet his views to have the other States included in the resolution for a special committee. The only object I have in asking for a special committee is that it may have time to devote itself to the subject. I understand that the Committee on Public Lands have their time very much occupied with many important matters already before it.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the resolution itself should go to the Committee on Public Lands, and then with the knowledge they have upon the subject and with the information they have derived from various sources they may wish to enlarge the scope of the inquiry or they may not think it necessary; I do not know.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the honorable Senator that while I shall not be very importunate for a special committee, the Committee on Public Lands are engaged almost all their time, and will be at this session, in hearing various representatives of different railroad corporations on the subject of the forfeiture of railroad land grants, and that they will have very little time to devote themselves to this subject. I have no objection to an amendment of the resolution so as to include all other States.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator misunderstands me. I do not wish to have this subject examined by the Committee on Public Lands, but only that the Committee on Public Lands shall report whether it is necessary to raise a special committee for the purpose; in other words, that the resolution shall go to the Committee on Public Lands and be reported back with such recommendation as that committee may see fit to make. That is my idea in regard to a special committee; or if the Committee on Public Lands can undertake the investigation, it seems to me wiser and better that they should make it. They must have a large amount of information upon the general topic, and indeed the investigations of the committee are in the very direction indicated by the Senator from Florida in many respects; that is, as to public lands included in railroad land grants. I only ask a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands. It seems to me that it ought to be referred to the committee.

Mr. CALL. It was my purpose in offering the resolution to send up and have read a number of letters from gentlemen of character and consideration asking that some action might be taken. The subject is of necessity one which will require special proof and investigation into each individual case. I do not know that there is anything before the Committee on Public Lands or accessible to them beyond these letters making statements in individual cases which have come to me, some of which I ask the consent of the Senate to publish in the RECORD as part of my remarks. I shall not detain the Senate by reading them.

I do not undertake to say that there is any truth in these statements, but only state that there have been complaints from men of great respectability and character, stating the facts in individual cases. If there is any truth in the statements, then there is a subject upon which Congress should take some action, but the proof of the fact whether there is or not remains to be discovered by this proposed committee.

There is nothing now before the Committee on Public Lands, and there can be nothing accessible to them until they send for witnesses and examine them as to specific statements in each particular case.

For that reason I should prefer a special committee, though I should have no objection to their being charged with the inquiry into every other State where other statements of like character may be made if the Senator will not object to it. If he does, I shall of course accept whatever order the Senate may make in the premises.

Mr. PLUMB. Is the resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not before the Senate except by unanimous consent. The Senator from Florida asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands before it is considered here.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that is done——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Public Lands, but I think that committee ought to decide whether the investigation should be made by a special committee and whether it should apply to Florida or include the whole country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Vermont as objecting to the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to print in the RECORD certain letters to which he has referred. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that leave will be granted.

The letters are as follows:

ORLANDO, ORANGE COUNTY, FLORIDA, November 16, 1885.

SIR: Some time last June I wrote your Department relative to applications pending to have certain United States lands selected under Congressional act of 1850 (swamp and overflowed) as State lands in townships as follows: 22 south, of ranges 30 and 31 east, comprising nearly 13,000 acres of land; also township 21 south, of ranges 30, 31, 32, and 33 east. I then inquired what measures were pending to ascertain how much of these lands could be properly classified as swamp and overflowed, informing your Department that some of them, from personal knowledge (perhaps one-quarter to one-third at least), were high, dry lands, and nearly one-half in township 22 south, of ranges 30 and 31 east, saying that I did not wish to contest the right to have them selected as State lands. I assumed then, as I assume now, that your Department will have competent and trustworthy agents to report upon them before they are approved as State selections. What I desire to know specially is the condition of the pending applications. How soon will they probably be disposed of? And if any remain United States lands I desire to make selections therefrom. Some, if not all, of these applications were filed about last March; and my first correspondence with your Department, as I now recall it, was some time in June last. I have made several ineffectual requests through the department at Gainesville for full information, and especially to know by name the person or persons who filed the applications, whether as individuals, corporations, or State officials.

I understood that some of these lands are ready to be approved as State selections as soon as parties can be secured to purchase them from the State. Can it be possible that these lands are thus withdrawn and withheld from entry from the time of the filing of these applications to this date in the interest of speculators?

If your Department will promptly answer this letter, by advancing the correspondence to the head of the list, I may be able to give further and more specific information, should your Department deem it advisable to be further informed.

I now aver, as I did in June last, that these lands as one body should not be passed to the State and the opportunity taken away from those who desire to homestead them under the national laws before searching inquiry be had by your Department; and if any have already been approved as State selections, an abrogating order should promptly issue, pending further inquiry.

Awaiting your early reply, I am,

Yours, very respectfully,

A. B. LONGAKER.

Hon. SECRETARY OF INTERIOR.

ORLANDO, November 23, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: I regret that I did not meet you during your late stay in and visit at Orlando. I have lately been visiting and prospecting the lands in Polk, Manatee, Monroe, Hillsborough, Dade, Brevard, and have been thoroughly acquainted in Orange County, and quite familiar heretofore with the whole southern region of the counties south of this, and I can safely say there are several hundred thousand acres of United States lands which I understood is sought to be taken and selected as State land under the allegation that it is swamp and overflowed, and I can safely say from personal knowledge of the county generally that there are at least 100,000 acres that in no sense can be claimed to be swamp and overflowed; and I understand that the United States land in Manatee and Monroe has been applied for as State land. This region I have traveled over during the last six months, and find much of it high and dry, and which ought not to be permitted to be selected as State lands.

I therefore ask you to interest yourself to prevent these lands from getting away from homesteaders, who ought to be secured the exclusive right to homestead them; at all events they should not be taken from the United States Government to get into railroad corporations and other monopolies.

Very truly yours,

A. G. ROBERTS.

Hon. W. CALL.

WILDWOOD, FLA., August 4, 1885.

HONORABLE SIR: I, as a citizen of Hernando County, Florida, having made improvement upon 160 acres of land claimed by the Yulee Railroad Company, known lately as the Florida Railway and Navigation Company's road, I settled upon the land as a bona fide settler in sincere good faith. Last December the lands were sold in my absence, while I was off from my place, to a monopolizing party. I still hold my improvement, but, as the lands have been sold for 20 miles ahead of the road, taking in my improvement at the same time, I have no courage to do anything, not knowing what is best for me to do. I now write to you to give me your sincere and definite opinion as to whether these lands will be canceled at the next Congress or not. I have no courage to go ahead and make any further improvements upon the lands until I can find out as to whether the land will be canceled and revert back to the Government or not; so I thought it my duty to write to you and get your opinion relative to the matter as to those lands, whether they will revert back or not. I made improvement on these lands, 160 acres, March 18, 1883, in good faith. Please address me by return of mail, to Reddick's Station, Marion County, Florida.

In conclusion, I remain,

Yours, very respectfully,

OWEN BOYLE.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate.

DADE CITY, FLA., June 13, 1885.

DEAR SIR: I write you this to show you how the actual settler has been treated by the Yulee Railroad Company. My father-in-law, P. M. Alexander, and myself settled upon this land, believing that we would get it at Government price. He is employed by one H. N. Bratton, who is a son-in-law of J. L. Clarkson. Now, when these lands were advertised for sale I went up to secure mine. When I got there I was informed by one Ricord, who is an employé of the company, that my land was sold. I then appealed to Mr. Wailes, and he told me that he would make everything satisfactory.

Mr. W. B. Clarkson then told me that his cousin, James L. Clarkson, had bought the property to befriend my father-in-law, P. M. Alexander. I then told him if that was the case I would relinquish to H. M. Bratton, which I did. On my return home I got my father, J. J. Thrasher, to borrow the money at 12 per cent. and go and pay Mr. Bratton, which he did, and had Mr. Bratton to order the company to make him the deed. Now Mr. Bratton told my father that the company made him pay $5 per acre for the land. My father, believing the statement, paid the money; but when the deed comes it only calls for $1 per acre. It also comes accompanied with the following letter from W. B. Clarkson in way of explanation:

J. J. THRASHER, Hatton, Fla.:

MY DEAR SIR: As agent for my cousin, J. L. Clarkson, and following his instructions, I inclose herein your deed from F. R. & N. Co. for 80 acres land in section 21, T. 25, R. 21. My cousin paid $5 per acre, as follows: $4 to the company and $1 per acre for securing land in advance. The price was marked at $5 per acre, and would have cost you just that much had you bought yourself; but I succeeded in reducing the price to $4 per acre, which, with the charge as above, raised the price to $5 per acre, as before. I hold receipt to show this. So then you only pay what you would have had to pay if you had bought it yourself. I make this explanation to show why J. L. C. charged you $5 per acre; 'tis what he himself paid.

"Very truly, yours,

"W. B. CLARKSON."

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
Jacksonville.

I then wrote Mr. Wailes a letter, telling him what W. B. Clarkson had written my father, and asked him if the statement was a true one, and if the rate of my land was not $2.50 per acre instead of $5 per acre, and the following is his reply. You will see that he does not answer a single question I asked him to:

"DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of 3d instant, I would state that the southeast quarter of section 21, T. 25 S., R. 21 E., was relinquished by you December 4, 1884, to Henry N. Bratton for value received, and in accordance with said relinquishment we sold the land to Mr. Bratton, and not to Mr. W. B. Clarkson, as your letter states. Mr. Clarkson also informs us that he has never bought any land of us for you. We can not see, therefore, that you have any cause of complaint against the company or against Mr. Clarkson.

"Yours, respectfully,

"Per STANFORD."

"Mr. C. B. THRASHER,
"Dade City, Fla."

Now, sir, what am I to do? Shall I fold my hands and silently submit to this outrage, because I am not able to take any proceedings against them? I can but cry to Heaven, because I know there is no law to protect a poor man, because he has no money to law with.

I do not think that there is hardly a settler in this country but what would gladly take the amount he has paid out for these lands with the value of his improvements added on, and kick the dust from his feet and leave the State. They have made appeals after appeals to the Government for protection against this company, but alas! it was all in vain, and nearly every one of the settlers to-day is in a state almost equal to beggary itself. They are like a helmless ship at sea without compass or rudder, at the mercy of every wind and wave, for they know of no power that they can appeal to for protection.

I tell you, sir, that the time is not far distant when the poor people of this country will be forced to resort to desperate means for the protection of their families and themselves against these unprincipled corporations that would rob them of the last vestige they had and cause their children to beg bread.

If you will only stand up to the settler you will long be remembered and never forgotten by the good people of Hernando County, Florida.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, most respectfully,

C. B. THRASHER.

N. B.—I would write to the press, but do not know of a paper that would publish without pay. You can use this any way you please. If you think there is any chance for me to recover my money please write me how to proceed.

Your friend,

C. B. THRASHER.

DADE CITY, FLA., July 7, 1885.

Senator CALL:

DEAR SIR: About February, 1882, I wrote a letter to A. T. Williams, railroad land commissioner of what was known as the "Yulee" railroad lands, making application for the east one-half of northeast one-quarter of section 15, T. 25 S., R. 21 E., and I received a circular stating that their lands lying in 6 miles of railroad line, which was mapped on the Washington line, would be sold to actual settlers at $2.50 per acre, and farther than 6 miles at $1.25 per acre. From this consideration I made improvement and settlement in March following, and have resided on it continuously ever since. Now my land is appraised at $10 per acre, and reserved, as they (the railroad company), say for railroad purposes. I am a poor man with a large family, and am not able to pay so much, and would not have settled had I known I would have had to pay so much. I am not able to pay so much, and will have to leave my place if I can not get it for less. I write to you for your advice and see if you can not induce the company to let me have it at Government price.

The way the railroad company have treated the people, they are now, except the land speculators, who bought their lands much less than the actual settlers who have bought, are praying for Congress to declare the lands forfeited and subject them to homestead entry. But few settlers have paid up for their lands, and many have not paid any, because they are not able, and the speculator will get them if there is no redress.

Respectfully,

J. J. ROGERS.

P. S.—Please to write me as soon as possible.

LEESBURG, SUMTER COUNTY, FLORIDA, October 9, 1885.

SIR: Yours of the 22d ultimo to hand and contents noted. Allow me to thank you for the interest manifested in the Cauthen homestead matter. The old gentleman has bought it out of the office. It is a great hardship upon him; but he thought he had better do it, as the railroad was claiming it. I hope the homestead settlers will be protected in their rights and property and not let the railroad corporation swindle them out of their lands. Corporations must be held in check as well as individuals.

Yours, truly,

THOMAS C. LANIER.

Hon. W. CALL,
Washington City, D. C.

BROOKSVILLE, FLA., May 22, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Our county and other parts are much troubled at the course of the Yulee railroad officials. They are now selling their lands—their unearned lands, as we think—without anything more than a mere shadow of a right. For the people to be thus wantonly robbed of their money and in many respects their lands also is certainly a fraud punishable by law. Will you please answer and give us your opinion on the subject. Will you give us your undivided support in Congress to help rid the country of so many fraudulent railroad officials, and have the lands thrown back as Government land, and thereby greatly benefit the masses and add more to your already fair-won fame as an honest promulgator of the rights of the people?

N. A. WILLIAMS.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL.

SUMTER COUNTY, FLORIDA, October 19, 1885.

DEAR SIR: I respectfully lay before your honor my complaint concerning my land. I can not get any satisfaction about it from Gainesville. I have been living on it ever since 1883. My father owned it in the date of 1880. I lived with him and helped him cultivate and improve it until I married, and in the date of 1883 I bought it and built on it, and sent my proof of this by two others, besides my own oath. I sent my money, $18, with my affidavit and application for the east half of the northwest quarter of section 11, and the east half of the southwest quarter of section 2, township 21 south of range 24 east, and they rejected it; and then I sent $50 to enter the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 11, township 21 south, of range 24 east, and it was refused, and their excuse was that it was railroad reserved land. And now Mr. King claims that he has bought it from the railroad company, and I want you to instruct me how to manage to homestead or enter, or whether I can get it or not. If I can get it please instruct me; and if you want to see their letters, all you have got to do is to let me know and I will send them to you at once. I can prove all of this if you want me to. Please send me full instructions how to do and what to do and all about it. I am entitled to a homestead and I want it. Where I am living my improvement is here. I am the only man that ever has lived on this land. I want you to do all you can towards it, for I am a mighty poor man, and I don't want to lose it and have it took away by speculators. I have got about six acres of hummock land cleared and under a good fence and a dwelling-house and corn-crib. If you can get it, all right; I will be more than glad.

Please let me hear from you soon. Direct to Exeter, Sumter County, Florida. Please let me hear from you at once.

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN REVELS.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
Washington, D. C.

CRYSTAL RIVER, FLA., May.

DEAR SIR: In a former letter I gave you a copy of a letter from D. M. Coffman, United States timber agent, which was as follows—(date March 18, 1885, from United States land office at Gainesville, Fla.):

"MY DEAR SIR: On my return here I found that the land you live upon belongs to the State, or rather did belong to it, but now belongs to a Mr. Ham, of Jacksonville, but he has offered me one-half interest in it, which I will buy Saturday, and then some time next week I will write you again. We want about ten acres cleared up right away, and then you can have some of the land or pay for your improvements.

"Your friend,

"D. M. COFFMAN.

"Mr. OLIVER SHRIVER,
"Crystal River, Fla."

I wrote to D. C. Wilson, esq., of Tallahassee, who replies, "I found that the lands in question do not now, and never did, belong to the State. Their status is as follows: They were United States lands, and were selected by John A. Henderson, of this place, in 1884, and are comprised in his selection, List 18. These lands have not as yet been patented to the State. I called on Colonel Henderson, and he says that by application to him before patent is issued to the State, he will sell them at State prices to actual settlers in preference to any speculators." Under date of April 23, 1885 (also from Gainesville land office), Coffman writes as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR: I failed to make trade with Ham, but he will be down himself soon. The land you asked me to look after down the river belongs to a man by the name of Hatton, in Missouri. Hatton seems to have bought a good many lands down there. I will probably be down in a few weeks. Ham says when he gets everything in shape he will give you a good job of clearing, probably forty or fifty acres, at $12 an acre. You will give my kindest regards to Mrs. Shriver and the children, also to Sharp and Carroll. Will say this to you, that you must not be uneasy as to yourself or family on account of Ham's purchases. While I can give you no definite answer yet, you will not be the loser or injured in any way, but, to the contrary, you will be benefited by the purchase.

"Your friend,

"D. W. COFFMAN.

"Mr. OLIVER SHRIVER,
"Crystal River, Fla.

"P. S.—Tell Mr. Carroll I am ready to purchase the Sullivan land whenever he says to the commissioner that he releases it."

This needs no comment. Neither Ham nor Dutton could have purchased any of these lands, and it is clear that it is a confederacy, probable with connivance, if not the positive aid of the officials of the Gainesville land office, to cheat the settlers out of their lands. With this S. I. Wailes has some probable connection, as will appear. I give the letters in the order of their dates:

"GAINESVILLE LAND OFFICE, December 11, 1884.

"SIR: Inclosed find map of township 19 south, range 16 east, as per your order of 23d ultimo. I have made you a $3 —— as per money forwarded. I can furnish you with a diagram showing land for $1 per township.

"Respectfully,

"OFFICE OF S. I. WAILES, LAND COMMISSIONER,
"Gainesville, January 30, 1885.

"DEAR SIR: I am in condition to inform you that lots 4, 7, and 8, section 10, township 19 south, range 16, can be purchased at the Government price, which is $1.25 per acre. These lots contain 138.49 acres; at the price named the purchase-money would amount to $198.02, which you can send me and I will see that you get your deed for the land. If the Johnson entry is canceled it will relieve the conflict with the State, and the lots can be purchased from the representative of said State. Let me hear from you.

"Very respectfully,

"A. N. HAM.

"OFFICE OF S. I. WAILES,
"Gainesville, February 15, 1885.

"DEAR SIR: Did you receive my letter of July 30, 1885, about the price of lots 4, 7, and 8, section 10, township 19 south, range 16 east. I informed you by letter that the land could be purchased at Government price ($1.25 per acre). There are 158.42 acres, which would amount to $198.02. Let me know whether or not you wish to buy.

"Very truly,

"A. W. HAM.

"OFFICE OF S. I. WAILES,
"Gainesville, March 7, 1885.

"DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of yours of 28th ult. in regard to lots 4, 7, and 8, section 10, township 19, range 16 east. The price named ($1.25) is the lowest price fixed for said lands. If I can be of any service to you in locating the improvements, &c., let me know; or if you desire other plats of the same I will attend to your matter until a deed is secured for the sum of $10. This is a small fee, bu under the circumstances I will not charge more. Please let me hear from you.

"Very truly,

The next is from the Gainesville land office, March 23, 1885:

"DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of 15th instant, I would state that Alexander Johnson's homestead, No. 14116, conflicts with State selections. Should Mr. Johnson relinquish his homestead it could not be entered by any one while it conflicts with State selections.

"Respectfully,

So it appears that Mr. Ham promised Gilmore what he could not perform, with what purpose is not very clear, but that he and D. M. Coffman intended, and intend, to cheat Shriver out of his patent is enough. Shriver entered a pre-emption upon his tract, lot 6, section 26, and lot 7, section 25, T. 19, R. 16, but was unable to raise the money when the time came to redeem it. He now has the money. He has lived upon it continuously, and is still upon it.

Respectfully,

E. W. PERRY.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Tallahassee, Fla., December 12, 1885.

DEAR SENATOR: I have received copy of a communication from you to the honorable Commissioner of Public Lands at Washington of date November 19, 1885, in which you inform the Commissioner that you have reason to believe, from information given to you by persons of good character, &c., that there is an extensive and organized system of fraud practiced in connection with the land office in Gainesville in the appropriation of the public lands of the United States for the benefit of speculators and to the detriment of actual settlers, whereupon you request that there shall be no further approvals by the Land Department of selections from the State until Congress shall meet and this subject receive full investigation, and that you will ask for a committee of investigation on the subject when Congress shall convene.

If there is any reason to suspect fraud or crookedness of any kind, either on the part of those representing the United States or on the part of those who in the past have represented or who now may be representing the State in the matter of swamp lands, to which I understand your communication refers, I beg to assure you of my willingness to heartily co-operate in such investigation as will discover the wrong and in such steps as will repair any injury that may have resulted therefrom.

I am totally in the dark as to the grounds of suspicion beyond what I can gather from your communication to the Commissioner, but from that I would infer that there must be suspicion against parties other than subordinates of the United States Government; for if not, I infer from the high character of the present officials of the Interior Department and the public confidence in their integrity and honest purpose to put down all crookedness in the administration of public interests you would have first applied to that Department for the investigation before bringing the matter to the attention of Congress.

If I am right in my inference that your information gives grounds for suspicion against any who have represented the State or are now doing so in the matter of determining what lands passed to the State by the act of 1850 as swamp and overflowed lands, am I asking too much in asking to be furnished with the facts upon which such suspicions are based, as I feel as much interest in straightening out crookedness, if any, on the part of those representing the State in that matter or any other as you or Congress can possibly feel.

As to those representing the United States, I can not readily see how there could be "an extensive and organized system of fraud practiced in connection with the land office in Gainesville," such as to lead to a suspension of all further approval by the Interior Department of selections of swamp and overflowed lands under the act of 1850, unless the State's representatives are in some way implicated; and if so I desire it to be distinctly understood that I am anxious to co-operate in making the investigation a thorough one, whether it be made by the Department at Washington or by Congress, should resort thereto be necessary (which I can not imagine in view of the character of the present Land Department of the United States Government) or wherever and however it may be proper that such investigation should be made.

Very truly, yours,

E. A. PERRY.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Vermont consents to withdraw his motion, I understand.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the motion for the purpose of having the resolution referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his objection to the present consideration of the resolution with a view to having it referred.

Mr. PLUMB. I renew the objection.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to withdraw the objection and allow me to have the resolution referred.

Mr. PLUMB. All right. I wish one moment, however, to say by way of explanation that this question I think the Senator from Florida somewhat mistakes. Certainly everything in relation to public lands that has been made the subject of any complaint is or may easily be brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior. If the reports made there indicate that there is a defect in the law, then of course Congress ought to act; but that it should ever go into the general discussion or investigation of individual cases of entry throughout the entire country is absolutely physically impossible.

I should be glad to have the case which the Senator from Florida makes presented to some committee, or to the Senate, or to the country, or anything of that kind which might meet with his views, but I think he is somewhat mistaken in regard to the scope which the investigation necessarily would take; and not for the purpose of enlarging the duties of the committee of which I happen to be chairman, but simply that this matter may be undertaken with a perfect knowledge of what it will undoubtedly bring forth I think myself the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. I understand the Senator from Kansas does not object to a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. No, not at all. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. If there is no objection the motion will be considered agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the matter is disposed of I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to his suggestion to print in connection with what he has said certain correspondence bearing upon the subject. Before the consent is given without objection I should like to inquire of him the nature of the correspondence, whether it is of a character which if not replied to would be defamatory to individuals officials, or others.

Mr. CALL. Not at all; there are no charges in reference to any individuals or officials, either State or United States.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I have no objection to the printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has already been entered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MICHIGAN RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Whereas by act of Congress approved June 3, 1856, there were granted to the State of Michigan certain lands to aid in the construction of railroads mentioned therein, among others for a line from Marquette to Ontonagon and from the two last named places to the Wisconsin State line; and

Whereas the State of Michigan conferred said grant from said points to the State line upon two companies, known as the Ontonagon and State Line Railroad Company, and the Marquette and State Line Railroad Company, which said companies, or their successor, so located their respective lines as to leave common or overlapping limits near the State line at the Brulé River; and

Whereas by joint resolution of Congress approved July 2, 1862, the grantees of the State were authorized to construct and build the said road to the State line upon another and different route, and said State was authorized to receive and was granted a like quantity of land upon said new line upon consideration of a surrender and release to the United States of the lands previously granted and certified to her upon said original lines, which surrender and release was duly made by said State and other lands along the new line certified to her in lieu thereof; and

Whereas the United States is largely interested pecuniarily in its right under the law to the benefit of competition in the sale of such of said lands as may not be covered by lawful claims of pre-emption or homestead settlers, which lands, so subject to public sale, are said to aggregate several millions of dollars in value: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate what is the exact present status of said lands, both odd and even sections, as shown by the records of his Department; whether, since the passage of the joint resolution of 1862, any of said lands, either odd or even sections, within the so-called common limits, have been reoffered at public sale or in any manner restored to private entry by executive order; also, what, if any, sales of said lands have been made at private entry, when and to whom, and whether patents have issued upon any of the same, and when and to whom so issued; also what, if any, pre-emption or homestead settlers' claims are now shown to be in conflict with such private entries, together with the names of such settlers and description of the land claimed, and whether any of such claims have been prosecuted to final proof and payment, and if so for what land and by whom; also what, if any, action has been had or taken in cases of such conflicts or is now being taken therein by the General Land Office or Department of the Interior; also, whether any of these claims have ever been examined upon the ground and reported upon by any special agent or agents of the Land Office, and if so to transmit copies of said reports to the Senate; also, whether any of such lands are being stripped of timber, and if so by whom, and what, if any, measures have been taken to stop such waste pending the final disposition of the question of title.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned to Tuesday, January 5, 1886.

CONFIRMATIONS.

John Bigelow, of New York, to be assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, State of New York.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 21, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announcing the adoption of joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives; in which concurrence was requested.

TESTS OF IRON AND STEEL, ETC.

The SPEAKER. In compliance with the statutes the Chair will lay before the House the following concurrent resolution for printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, December 18, 1885.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the reports of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes made at the Watertown arsenal and transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on the 3d of December, 1881, and 11th of December, 1885, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies of each report be printed; of which 1,000 copies of each report shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the War Department.

Attest:

ANSON G. McCOOK, Secretary.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. Res. 1) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to use a portion of the contingent fund to fit up rooms for the Commissioner of Patents; when the Speaker signed the same.

IMPORTATION OF CERTAIN GLASSWARE.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, some time in the week last past the gentleman from New York [Mr. BURLEIGH] offered a resolution asking for certain information from the Treasury Department in relation to an importation or invoice of Bohemian glass by a New York merchant. Not knowing exactly the purpose of the inquiry, I objected to the consideration of the resolution, and which was afterward referred. On examination I became satisfied the resolution has for its purpose the correction of some abuses that ought to be corrected, and will I think help to that end. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the resolution be now considered by the House, and to do which it will be necessary to discharge the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the resolution is not now with the Clerk of the House. Will the gentleman state where it is?

Mr. MORRISON. It was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means when formed. I ask now that it be brought into the House and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journal the resolution to which reference is made by the gentleman from Illinois, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to this House such information as he possesses, including copies of all official documents and correspondence on file in his Department, relating to the importation from Bohemia, in July last, by L. Lehman, of New York, into the port of New York, of certain glassware, and to the appraisement and reappraisement of the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEACH. I have an amendment to suggest to this resolution; that the word "requested" be substituted for the word "directed," where it occurs in the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. We do not use the word "request" in communications of this kind with the heads of Departments. The word used is the one always employed in like cases.

Mr. BEACH. Then I withdraw the amendment, which I offered under the impression that this was not in the customary form.

The SPEAKER. It is in the usual form of such resolutions.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

C. H. MANN.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent of the House to allow me to withdraw an objection to a resolution which was submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on Saturday. The resolution to which I refer was one relating to the compensation of the messenger to the reporters' gallery. Since that objection was made I have ascertained that he did not occupy the position I supposed he did, and I therefore withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, who objected on Saturday to the consideration of a resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana with reference to the compensation of the messenger to the reporters' gallery, now desires to withdraw the objection and asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Accounts, to which the resolution was to be referred when appointed, be discharged from the further consideration of said resolution, and that it be brought back into the House for immediate action.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and if there be no objection I ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be taken up for immediate action by the House.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 5) authorizing the payment of C. H. Mann, messenger to the reporters' gallery.

Resolved, &c., That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to C. H. Mann the salary provided in the act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, as messenger in the reporters' gallery from July 1 to December 7, 1885, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask what is the necessity for the passage of this resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no necessity, except that the messenger is not able to receive his pay without it. I presume the difficulty results from the circumstance of the death of the Doorkeeper during the vacation. Such I have understood to be the case.

There being no objection, the joint rosolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATION, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce and put upon its passage the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill making an appropriation of money for the relief of the Department of Justice.

Be it enacted, &c., That to enable the Attorney-General to employ additional clerical force in the Department of Justice, and for the purchase of furniture necessary for the building of that Department to facilitate the examination and preparation of French spoliation claims to be submitted to and considered by the Court of Claims, $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be drawn upon the warrant of the Attorney-General. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect from the passage thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. I will state the facts very briefly. On Saturday last a letter was received and read to the House from an assistant attorney of the Department of Justice addressed to the Attorney-General, containing a recommendation and request for an appropriation to meet a temporary necessity which is fully set forth in that letter. This bill is in compliance with his request. It provides for only $8,000. If any gentleman desires to hear it again I will ask that the letter be read for the information of the House. Unless some such desire is expressed, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I ask that this resolution be referred to the proper committee. It is an appropriation that ought to be looked into.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. HERBERT. Then I ask consent that it be referred to a special committee of three, to be appointed by the Speaker, with authority to report without delay.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] on Saturday last introduced this bill and asked its immediate consideration, but objection was made, and therefore, as the Chair was informed, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HERBERT. That committee can be discharged from its further consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOFF. That is a mistake. This bill was not referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HERBERT. I understood that the objection made on Saturday would not be renewed to-day.

The SPEAKER. But it has gone to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GOFF. It was not referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Virginia withdrew it.

Mr. HERBERT. Then I shall change the form of my request and ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration. If the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his objection I will put the request in that form.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say simply, in reference to this communication from the Attorney-General's Office, that it has been the custom heretofore for the Departments to send in special communications in relation to such matters, and they have uniformly been sent to the Committee on Appropriations to investigate and make provision for them. I do not see any reason for any difference in this respect.

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman will listen to the reasons contained in the letter to which I have referred he will see that the circumstances of this case are special.

Mr. BLOUNT. They are always special.

The SPEAKER. The subject is not before the House, objection having been made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. HENLEY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to the appropriate committees when appointed. Under this call——

Mr. WAIT. I trust the gentleman from California will withdraw his objection. I only want to refer this resolution to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman can do that under the call, which is the regular order.

Mr. WAIT. This resolution is different in its character from bills and joint resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state that under the amended rule not only bills and joint resolutions but concurrent resolutions and simple resolutions of the House will be in order under this call; also memorials and joint resolutions from State and Territorial Legislatures for reference only. The call begins with the State of Alabama.

VACATION OF PATENTS.

Mr. HERBERT introduced a bill (H. R. 25) to provide a mode of vacating patents in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS, MARSHALS, ETC.

Mr. HERBERT also introduced a bill (H. R. 26) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the bill belongs to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. HERBERT. It relates to a matter of which I think the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction.

Mr. SPRINGER. Last session this bill was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. The clause defining the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary is a general clause; whereas the clause defining the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is special, and enumerates various subjects over which it shall have jurisdiction; and the fees and compensation of public officers is one of these subjects.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. MARTIN.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama (by Mr. HERBERT), introduced a bill (H. R. 27) to pay William F. Martin, of Mobile, Ala., the value of one hundred half-boxes of tobacco illegally seized and sold by the collector of internal revenue at New Orleans; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT JUDGE, ALABAMA.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama (by Mr. HERBERT), also introduced a bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MOBILE DOCK COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama (by Mr. HERBERT), also introduced a bill (H. R. 29) for the relief of the Mobile Dock Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MOBILE DEPOSIT SAVINGS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama (by Mr. HERBERT), also introduced a bill (H. R. 30) for the relief of the Deposit Savings Association of Mobile, Ala.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (H. R. 31) for the erection of a public building at Birmingham, Ala.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. MARTIN also introduced a bill (H. R. 32) to amend an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER K. SHEPARD.

Mr. MARTIN also introduced a bill (H. R. 33) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INDEXING AND SALE OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MARTIN also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 6) providing for the indexing and sale of public documents; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COOSA.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire, at the request of General BRAGG, of Wisconsin, who can not be here, to introduce a bill for him.

Mr. DUNN. I shall have to object to that, Mr. Speaker. When the State of Wisconsin is called I shall have no objection to any member present introducing a bill for any Representative of that State who may be unable to be here; but I can not consent that the State shall be taken out of its regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is not granted.

SUPPORT OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. WHEELER introduced a bill (H. R. 43) to aid in the temporary support of common schools; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education, and ordered to be printed.
